

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. of a majority of their Lordships' House, and he was unwilling to disturb the arrangement that had been arrived at, especially as it might be urged on the third reading, as it was on the second reading, that the clause, if amended as proposed, would interfere too much with the rights of the father.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that it was a matter of compromise. The Bill stood now as it was altered by their Lordships, and if the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend was carried in a substantial form it would endanger the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would suggest that the words proposed to be omitted should be retained, but that these words should be added—

"And make such order in respect of the guardianship as to the Court shall seem right."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Court may make orders as to custody).

LORD ASHBOURNE said, under this clause as it stood it would be quite competent when the father and mother were living together, for the mother, having different views from her husband as to how the children should be brought up, to ask the opinion of the Court whether she or her husband was right. That was a very dangerous power to give the wife, and might lead to litigation, confusion, and unhappiness in families. It was a great change to make in English domestic life. He was about to move an Amendment which was recommended by the great experience of Lord Cairns, and which Lord Cairns moved in the Select Committee. The noble and learned Lord then moved an Amendment which would give the wife power to apply to the Court when the husband and wife were not living together.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, that the Amendment now proposed, when moved in the Select Committee by Lord Cairns, was not assented to, and he did not think Lord Cairns was dissatisfied with the result. No one would attribute greater weight to Lord Cairn's opinion than he should do; but the reasons against the proposition were irresistible to the minds of those who voted against it, and to his mind were irresistible still. It should be remembered that in framing this clause they had not only to consider the case of persons in a superior class of life, but also the case of those who for want of means were compelled to live together. In many cases among the poorer classes the wife would be justified in making such an application, and by adopting the Amendment they would, he believed, in point of fact be doing an injustice.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he considered that the clause was a direct invitation to litigation between husband and wife. There was no qualification whatever in it. He thought it would at least be a good thing that the application in the first instance should be made ex parte, so that the tribunal applied to should be able to form an opinion as to whether the case was one that should be inquired into.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he felt the force of the remarks of the noble and learned Earl opposite (the Earl of Selborne), and that he would carefully consider all that had been said before the next stage of the Bill.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR then moved to insert, after Clause 5, the following words:—

"And in every case (the Court) may make such order affecting the costs of the mother and the liability of the father for the costs of the mother as it may think just."

He pointed out that in some cases it might be unfair and undesirable to saddle the husband with the costs.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD DENMAN, who had given Notice to move, after Clause 5, to insert the following new Clause:—

"In case of the conduct of any father making it wrong for him to have the custody of his infant children or child, and if his wife, their mother, should have a separate household, she, by the order of the Probate and Divorce Court or other court of the High Court of Justice, or of the nearest county court, shall have all the rights which other householders possess, or may in future possess, at every election of Members of Parliament and at all other elections," said: I must explain that this Amendment was broached by me in the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill, on December 4th, 1884; and on the Infants Bill, 1885, the same clause by me was proposed. I am aware that it cannot pass until a Women's Suffrage Bill has been carried, and it is indifferent to me in which House it originates. On the 9th July, 1884, Earl Cairns wrote to me, advising me to postpone my Bill to the next open day; but I could not do so, as it preceded the Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill in the Orders of the Day, and, as I considered that as peculiarly a woman's question, I thought that it ought to remain before it; but all Business was suspended on the 10th of July. I venture to think that no Dissolution should be granted by the Crown until women, duly qualified, are added to the electors. It has been surmised that this measure ought first to pass in "another place;" but this has never been openly advocated, and I can only hope that this provision for married women judicially separated from their husbands will be considered in Committee in both Houses of Parliament by those who understand the subject. I beg to withdraw the proposed Amendment.

Clause (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. No. 125.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (DURHAM) BILL.—(No. 123.)

(The Lord Bishop of Durham.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM (Dr. LIGHTFOOT), in rising to move the third reading of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Durham) Bill, said: My Lords, I move that you give a third reading to this Bill. I had hoped that I should not have troubled you again; but as I see that the third reading is to be opposed—a somewhat unusual, but, I confess, a perfectly legitimate course—I hope I may be excused if I add a few words to what I have already said on the subject. The noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss) who proposes to move the rejection of the Bill drew a picture of the agitations which he supposed had been got up in order to promote the Bill. I was supposed to have sent out my chaplains and emissaries far and wide, and to have summoned my clerical liegemen to the fray. I assure the noble Earl that if he knew the people of Durham as well as I know them, he would at once see that such a state of things was impossible. They are a very sturdy and a very independent race, and anything like episcopal or clerical dictation would be at once resisted by them. It is not alone on the part of the clergy of the Church of England that there has been a movement in favour of this Bill. The Nonconformist ministers are at least as eager as the clergy of the Church of England, and the Roman Catholic priests are at least as eager as the Nonconformist ministers. I assure the noble Earl that he flatters me too much if he supposes that I have such great influence with those two bodies. The noble Earl is, I think, disposed to discount the value of clerical evidence, and some stress has naturally been laid on the experience of Judges and magistrates. Well, they, of course, see much of the working of intemperance; but I venture to say that the clergy and ministers of religion see far more. The magistrates only have to deal with intemperance when it has ripened into crime; and for every case which comes before the magistrates there are perhaps 50 which come under the notice of the clergy, where it goes no further than ruin and desolation to a household. Besides, I would ask you to remember that the Petitions which I have laid upon the Table from time to time represent the most varied interests. One or two came from nearly the whole medical body of the chief town in my diocese—Sunderland—40 out of 44—

whilst another has been signed by 60 or 70 of the employés in the engine shops of the North-Eastern Railway. I have brought from time to time Petitions from what we call pit villages, having populations of from 5,000 to 7,000, signed by from 2,000 to 3,000; and this day I have presented three Petitions from the parish of Bishop Auckland, the number of signatures of which amounts altogether to something like 2,700. Public meetings also have been held there—one in the Market Place, within a stone's throw of my own house, and it is reported to me that there were only six or seven dissentient voices. It may be said that this was out of compliment to me; but I assure you, my Lords, it was nothing of the kind. The people of Bishop Auckland are as independent as any in Durham. A predecessor of mine was burned in effigy at the very gates of Auckland Castle because he had displeased the people by an adverse vote on the great Reform Bill. These are signs, and I could bring forward others, which I cannot neglect, and which, to my mind, at all events, are convincing that I am not wrong in saying that the feeling of the working men in Durham is strongly in favour of this Bill. I do not think that anyone who has studied the working of the Act in Scotland can come to any but one conclusion. I believe there has never been an attempt there to repeal the Act, and that no section of the community is discontented with its operation. For what are the facts? In 1852-3 the number of convictions for Sunday drunkenness was 708; in 1884 they had diminished to 194. But if you take the numbers from 8 o'clock in the morning on Sunday to 8 o'clock on the morning of Monday, the disproportion is still greater, and that is a fairer test. They were 367 in the one case, and—I am not quite sure about my figures, but either 32 or 52—say 52 in the second case. It was said that shobeens would increase; but the number has diminished by more than half—242 in 1852 to only 101 in 1884. Those are the Edinburgh numbers. The Glasgow statistics are in the same direction. The populations of Glasgow and of Liverpool are nearly the same, but the convictions for Sunday drunkenness in Liverpool are just double what they are in Glasgow; and if I were again to take the statistics from

8 o'clock in the morning of Sunday to 8 o'clock of the morning of Monday, the disproportion would again be still greater. The satisfactory working of the Irish Act, again, will hardly be disputed. There was a general desire, as your Lordships will remember, not only for its continuance, but also for its extension to the exempted districts. At the time there were gloomy forebodings expressed for Ireland, such as are now put forth by the noble Earl with regard to this Bill for Durham, in the event of its being carried. They have not been realized. Ireland has since seen trouble, but not from this cause. Then there is the Welsh Act, where the evidence is more conflicting. I have gone a great deal into the matter—as doubtless many of your Lordships have done—and the conclusion I have come to is, that in a large portion of the country it works very satisfactorily, but that in some of the large towns, especially those on the frontier, some inconvenience has been the result; though even here there has been divers opinions. At the same time, I should not lay so much stress on the instance which the noble and learned Lord gave of travelling between Swansea and the Mumbles. Are we living in a fool's paradise, and do we not know that the same thing is going on everywhere—even under the present law? One of the Petitions I handed in came from the inhabitants of a large village on the Tees, in the neighbourhood of a great town. There was practical unanimity in the signing the Petition, and the special ground urged was that the public-houses of the village were flooded with people on Sundays from the large town, and so had become a scene of riot and revel. Very much has been said about the difficulty of the frontier line of Durham—more especially on the Tyne. I am quite prepared to admit there may be some inconvenience; but what I contend is that, on the whole, the Bill will be for the general advantage of the community. It must be remembered that even now there are different municipal laws on either side of the Tyne. For instance, there was another social nuisance which was attacked much more persistently and more systematically on the South side of the Tyne than on the North, and the consequence was that it was driven over to the North side. The result was that the example of the South side was taken up on the North, and a better state of things has been the consequence. Then something has been said of bogus clubs. I think before long you will have to deal with that subject. May I, in conclusion, say one word on the general question? A generation ago England was going from bad to worse through intemperance, when a noble body of temperance workers arose. By their energetic action the tide has been stemmed, and an appreciable influence has been exerted over the morals of the country. Now, I ask is it generous, is it just, is it consistent that, while every good citizen speaks highly of this achievement, our opponents should use words only of disparagement bordering on contempt towards the workers themselves? I will speak quite freely, for I claim no merit to myself—I am only the spokesman of those who have borne the heat and burden of the day. For myself, I am content, and more than content, to be supposed to be possessed of “a craze” if I can do anything, however little, to mitigate this great evil. History is full of consolations. Far stronger and wiser and better men than myself have been called harder names. Their cause has triumphed in the end, and future ages have enrolled them as their benefactors.

—The Lord Bishop of Durham.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in rising to move the rejection of the Bill, said: I present a Petition from the city of Durham praying that Durham City may be exempted; another from Petitioners in Durham against the Bill; and a third from the Labourers' Association in London, also against the Bill, pointing out that legislation of this kind will lead to the springing up of bogus clubs, and is an unjust and uncalled-for interference with individual liberty. Although your Lordships, in an evil and unguarded hour, passed the second reading of this Bill, yet if you now decide to throw it out you will be acting in perfect consistency with what you have already done in previous Sessions in regard to other measures of a similar character. The right rev. Prelate has referred to the excellent work that has been done during the present generation by temperance reformers, and he insinuated that this work was by the opponents of this Bill derided. But that is not the fact. I contend that there are no men more respected than the teetotallers and Good Templars and others who are striving against the evils of drunkenness; and I think that their having been able to do so much good work renders a Bill of this kind absolutely unnecessary. I object to this Bill on two grounds. I object to it on account of its exceptional character, and on account of the principles which it involves. This exceptional legislation means the thin end of the wedge, for once the law applies to the county of Durham other counties will be obliged to follow suit. I object to the whole principle and basis of this Bill, which enacts that the majority shall enforce the restriction. The city of Durham, for instance, wishes to be excepted from the Bill, the majority being against it, yet it is not proposed to except the city.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM said, the noble Earl was misapprehending him. He did not support the Bill merely on that ground. He considered it to be right in itself, but at the same time he believed the majority of the people were in favour of it.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: But the right rev. Prelate does not apply this principle generally in legislation. Now, as to the marriage laws. Would he vote for an alteration of the law which prohibits marriage with a deceased wife's sister if a majority in his division desired it? The majority in Wales, for instance, are supposed to be in favour of getting rid of the Established Church. Would he, in such a case, apply his principle? Then take the Contagious Diseases Acts. The towns which came under the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts have petitioned against the Acts being done away with. Is the right rev. Prelate prepared to support the view of the majority in that case? No, this principle when tested will not hold water; and I protest against the idea that because in any locality there is a majority in favour of a measure it is the duty of the Legislature to pass that measure. The right rev. Prelate has based his arguments for this Bill on the case of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. With regard to the result of such measures as the one now before us, I venture to think that he result in Wales is fatal to this kind of legislation, regarding it not merely from the point of view of its character, but from that of putting down drunkenness. Here are Home Office figures which have been analyzed for me at the Home Office, and give this result as regards Wales. Allowing for the increase of population since the passing of the Sunday Closing Act in 1881-2, the increase in convictions for Sunday drunkenness in the year 1883-4 was 27 per cent, as compared with the time when the Act was passed. On the other hand, what is the state of things in Durham, in the diocese of the right rev. Prelate? During the same period, whereas in Wales there has been an increase of 27 per cent, in Durham without the Act there has been a decrease of 20 per cent in the number of convictions for Sunday drunkenness. The last Returns further show that in 1883-4 there were 871 convictions for drunkenness in Durham; in the year 1884-5, which is the last, there were 542. There has thus been a decrease in Durham itself, comparing 1883-4 with 1884-5, of no less than 43 per cent; and I say that is a result of the efforts of the good men to whom the right rev. Prelate referred, and it shows that there is no necessity for exceptional and vicious legislation of this character. The right rev. Prelate also referred to the dicta of magistrates. What did Mr. Justice Manisty say after the passing of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act? He said—

“He could not adequately express the disgust he felt at the state of society in Cardiff, which was shocking. After what he had heard of those terrible dens (bogan clubs) he was beginning to understand the reason of the very heavy calendar he had to dispose of.”

Here is what the Chairman of a Petty Sessions in Wales says—

“The Returns made by the police showed that drinking had been very much on the increase since the passing of the Sunday Closing Bill. The Sunday Closing Act was a great mistake, and Sergeant Ward said he could point to a hundred cases of drunkenness in Flint to one before the Act. The illicit drinking had been fearful.”

At Cardiff there is a Roman Catholic Temperance League; and at a meeting in 1884 Father Robinson expressed his regret at having signed a Petition in favour of this legislation, and said that—

“No Act would make people sober. If they shut up one place another would be opened, for the people would get it somewhere. There was now more drunkenness, more sin, more iniquity of every kind committed in Cardiff than ever was before.”

So much for England. Of our Colonies I cannot speak; but in Australia the temperance movement has gone to this extent that barmaids are barred, not being allowed on account of young men visiting the bars and flirting with them, and tippling while so doing, while it was supposed that the presence of the “pot boy” would hold out no such inducement. If we take the case of America, I think that the figures with regard to Sunday Closing will absolutely silence the supporters of this Bill. At a meeting of the Social Science Association at Prince’s Hall, London, lately, Mr. Mott stated that in the State of Maine, where the sale of liquor is prohibited, the number of convictions for drunkenness was larger in proportion than in any English town. The death-rate was the exact average of the United States, and was no less, although there are no large towns; the amount of insanity, which was largely attributable to drinking, was very great, and the number of divorces was exceptionally large, showing a bad state of society. “Maine,” he said, “has gained nothing by prohibition, but it has lost the habit of obeying the laws.” I have said enough upon the exceptional character of the Bill; now let me say a few words about the general principle of the Bill to which I object. The real objection to this Bill is that it is an unwarrantable interference with individual liberty. Will anyone stand up—will any Member of the Episcopal Bench—and dare to say that the moderate use of wine and beer is an offence? The use is not an offence; the offence is in the abuse. What are you going to do? You are going to create offences where there are none, morally or legally, at the present time. You are going in the interests of a few drunkards to bind the great majority of sober Englishmen, to deprive them of their freeman’s right to have a glass of beer on Sunday. What is worse, you are going, as is shown by the example of Scotland and Wales, to produce the result of forcing such laws down unwilling throats; to create offences which do not now exist; and, what is worse, you are going to teach men to evade the law. for in countries where prohibition is the law its evasion has become a profession and an art. It is not by repressive legislation of this kind that this evil of drunkenness is to be cured. The suppression of this offence is a matter not for legislation, but for police. If a man gets drunk and is a nuisance to his neighbours in the street, lock him up until he is sober and fine him; if a publican is in the habit of serving a drunkard, warn him the first time, and then fine him and shut up his premises if he continues to offend. Let me sum up my objections to the Bill. (1) I object to the unprecedented principle of legislation; (2) I complain that where such legislation has been tried the proof is against it; (3) its effects are intolerable to the neighbouring counties; (4) it creates offences where there are now none, and leads to contempt of the law; (5) and it interferes with individual rights. I listened with pleasure to the closing passage of the speech of the right rev. Prelate who moved the second reading of the Bill (the Bishop of Durham). He on that occasion, in pathetic tones, spoke of the poor and the temptations to which they were exposed, and called upon your Lordships to remove from the poor weak man—the drunkard—and from those who feared they would fall into it, the temptation at their door in the shape of a public-house open on Sunday. I do not wish to preach; but it strikes me that we are all subject to temptation in this world in various degrees, shapes, and times, and that what we have been taught in our youth is to endeavour to resist temptation, and not pray for Acts of Parliament that it may be taken from us. You should teach the people to resist temptation so that it may flee from them. That would be far better than coming to Parliament for a special Act to take away the temptation, an Act which has failed wherever it has been tried—in Wales, in parts of Ireland, in America. It will not only fail in this case, but it will tend to warp and weaken the moral character of those for whose benefit it is supposed to be enacted.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—The Earl of Wemyss.

LORD KENSINGTON said, he should be very sorry indeed, after the speech of the noble Earl who had just sat down, and the statement that prohibition had failed in Wales, if no one from the Principality of Wales rose to say a word or two on the question. He had had the honour of representing a Welsh constituency in the House of Commons, and had lived a good many years in the Principality. The noble Earl had stated more than once in his speech that the Welsh Sunday Closing Act had been a failure, and he supposed that the noble Earl founded that assertion on the statistics to be gathered from Cardiff and Swansea.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: And Wrexham.

LORD KENSINGTON: Those two towns were certainly the two largest in the Southern part of the Principality, but they did not represent the whole population of the Principality, and he ventured to say that in a case like this the rural districts ought to be taken into consideration just as much as the large and populous towns. In large towns there were people who would, whether the Act were passed or not, get drink, and he was afraid get drunk; but all legislation of the kind proposed by the Bill must not be stopped because such people existed. He himself lived in the county of Pembroke, and in close proximity to where he lived there was a village which was principally inhabited by fishermen. They were good hard-working men afloat, but he was sorry to say a good many of them had the credit of being very thirsty when they were on shore and not at work. But what did the wives and mothers of the village say about Sunday Closing? They said the place had been very different since the public-house had been closed on Sunday; they had now a quiet Sunday without any disturbances and rows. This added to the comfort of the wives and mothers, and he contended that they ought to be considered as well as the men, and the people who lived in the large towns. As to the bond fide traveller difficulty, people would always be found to travel out and turn themselves into bond fide travellers, and the practice had no doubt become a nuisance; but he thought the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss) would do better to devote himself to the discovery of some method for suppressing that nuisance than in opposing the measure now before the House. By so doing, he would confer not only a great benefit on his own country, but on the Principality of Wales.

LORD NORTON said, that although he agreed with most that had fallen from the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss), yet, having voted against the second reading of this Bill, he felt bound to vote for the third reading. The question was whether the desire for this Bill was unanimous in the locality, or, at least, the predominant desire of the great majority. The noble Earl on the Cross Benches, when the Bill was in Committee, described the character of the local opponents of the measure as drunkards and rioters, who pelted the supporters with rotten eggs, and put down all discussion by violence.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that that was not his description, but the description of the Temperance Party. What he himself said was exactly the reverse.

LORD NORTON said, that the description given showed that the decent population were in favour of the Bill. He would therefore appeal from Durham drunk to Durham sober. He did not like to identify himself with the drunken portion of the population. At the same time, he himself condemned the Bill now as much as he had done before. The people of Durham, however, must find out their own mistake. Instead of such a measure as this, an effort should be made to put down drunkenness itself by refusing the renewal of licences to those houses where drunkenness had been permitted. This Bill would only change the place of drunkenness and would not cope with the evil. It was proposed to close public-houses as shops on Sunday; but they were not only places of sale but for sociality, which might be as decent as in restaurants abroad. Closing one set of drinking houses would only open another, and when the public-houses were closed Durham would come to Parliament again for a Bill to shut up clubs set up instead, and so on through endless occasions. To conceal an evil was not to cure it. If the people of the whole county of Durham wished to try this experiment, was it not a strong proceeding to say that they should not be allowed to do so? Durham must learn by experience of false methods how to arrive at the proper use of things in a better way than changing the venue of the abuse.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have the misfortune to differ from my noble Friend who has just sat down (Lord Norton) in that I shall do what to him seems unreasonable, and vote in the same way on the third reading as I did on the second. At the same time, I am bound to tender my thanks to my noble Friend, for if he is not able to give us a vote he has given us one of the most effective speeches against the Bill. I quite accept the platform of argument on which my noble Friend has placed this discussion. I think the main question, the practical question, which we have to decide is, whether there is sufficient evidence before us that the people of Durham have a paramount desire for this Bill. But before I say a word upon this point I must remind my right rev. Friend who moved the third reading to-night (the Bishop of Durham) that he has entirely mistaken the meaning and purport of the censures which were cast upon the movement by which this Bill has been brought forward. Nobody has meant to censure the heroic workers in favour of temperance who have done so much to improve the condition of this country, and who are so great an honour to it. And even when their admiration of temperance, universally shared, is carried to the extreme point of recommending entire abstinence, those who do not agree with them would still recognize that they held a perfectly defensible position, and that they show, in the advocacy of their opinions, some of the highest qualities of citizenship. It is not those who preach temperance in any form that are liable to censure; it is those who come to Parliament to ask for the secular arm to effect that which they have not been able to accomplish. I confess it is with great regret that I see that the clergy of all denominations, who, unfortunately, do not agree upon other matters as much as we could wish, are able to agree in this, that they will appeal to the secular arm to help them. It is a sad thing to think that the only point on which the unity of religious bodies can be hoped for is in the desire to make use of the secular and temporal powers to carry into effect that which should certainly be the result of their own high mission and of their persuasive eloquence. Now, what are we doing? We are enacting that on one day in every week a certain portion of the population in this country shall abstain from one of their accustomed articles of diet because a section of the population say that the temptation to consume too much of that article of diet is too strong for them. That is the gist of this legislation. It is admitted, I think, on all hands that in strictness the principle which is taken up by my noble Friend who moves the rejection of this Bill is a sound one, and that in strictness you have no right to interfere with one man's liberty because another man does not possess the virtue of self-control. But I am not going to argue on that ground. I quite admit, after what has happened in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, that it might be logical but it is not practical to address a Legislative Assembly on that ground. I am willing to meet the right rev. Prelate half way. He would prohibit the opening of public-houses on Sunday, or possibly the opening of public-houses at all, whether the majority liked it or not. I have great doubts whether the majority have the right to legislate for the minority upon the point. But let us meet upon this common ground, that, at all events, in imposing these anomalous and paradoxical restrictions we ought to be quite certain that we shall be acting according to the will of the majority of the people of the district affected; that we shall either provide machinery which will ascertain the existence of that majority, or that in other ways we shall so act that there shall be no doubt upon the point. The result of my consideration has been that it is to me a matter of great doubt whether that preponderance of opinion exists in the county of Durham or not; and I would point out that we are specially bound in this particular kind of legislation to be careful that we know the opinions of those on whose behalf we profess to act. In ordinary matters, in almost all other matters but this, the two Houses of Parliament are representative of the country in the highest sense. They are samples of the country; and whatever they feel and think it is probable that other Englishmen in some degree feel and think. But here you have the very remarkable position of two bodies of men legislating for another class in whose habits they do not partake, and imposing upon them restrictions which they themselves will not have to undergo. I say that that condition of matters imposes upon you, above all things, the necessity of ascertaining whether the people of the county of Durham by a large majority really wish for this change. What evidence have you of the wishes of the people of Durham? I am told that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack (Lord Herschell) has represented Durham. But he has been succeeded by a Gentleman who gives an entirely different statement as to the feelings of the constituency which he represented. Then, we are told that the Representatives of the county of Durham in the other House voted for this Bill. Were they elected on this subject? Was this a matter on which the Election turned? Was this the burning question brought before them? We all of us remember what the burning questions were, what was contained in a certain Manifesto, and what were the subjects discussed and examined backwards and forwards in every part of the country. I remember nothing about the passing of such a Bill as this. I remember that the late Government expressed their opinion that the matter ought to be left to the judgment of the localities acting through freely-elected representative bodies, and that that view was generally accepted on all sides of politics throughout the country. But I remember no indication that the Election turned upon the question of this Bill in such a sense as to authorize the Members for Durham to speak absolutely for the people. Then you come to the other modes of representation. What is the state of things in respect to Petitions? The Petition of 60,000 voters has been impugned. It had been found that there was some mistake in one signature, and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack said that there were many others in the same handwriting. The noble and learned Lord knows how Petitions are drawn up. There is such a thing as the illiterate voter in this country, and there is also the illiterate signer of Petitions. It may be a very wrong way, but the ordinary way in which a man who does not care to confess that he cannot write his signature will act is this—instead of confessing it before the world by putting his cross to the Petition, he would say—"Just put my name down for me." My noble Friend (the Earl of Wemyss) has produced more Petitions to-night, signed by extensive numbers in Hartlepool and elsewhere. There, at all events, there is no proof of any unanimity. Then, with regard to another point. My noble Friend (Lord Norton) was very much impressed by the fact that a public meeting was held on behalf of this Bill, and that great indignation was expressed, and that the occupants of the platform were driven out. Well, of course, it was very wrong of the indignant lovers of freedom to take that course; but we know there has been a great deal of discussion as to the Constitutional right of having recourse to physical force. I do not wish to support such a doctrine as that you have a right to disturb a public meeting; but certainly you cannot cite it as a proof of the unanimity when a public meeting assembled to support the measure is dispersed by force. On the other hand, there was a meeting called to oppose the Bill, and the occupants of the platform were not driven out. I do not say that that proves that Durham is against this Bill, but it is a proof that there is not that overwhelming preponderance of opinion which alone can justify you in asserting that you are the representatives of the people in this matter. I have done what is in my power to ascertain the opinion of those who know the county, and, according to their statement, it is very much divided. For instance, I have here a telegram I have received—

"Splendid meeting at North Stockton last night; estimated to have been 7,000. Resolutions carried by tremendous majority.—PHILLIPS."

Here is another one—

"Meeting at Stockton. Great success; 6,000. Will write to-night."

These resolutions were opposed to the Bill. I think the Resolution of my noble Friend was the resolution carried. I am told that at Hartlepool there was an attempt to pass a Petition in favour of the Bill through a representative body, the Local Board of Health, and the Petition was thrown out. That is not a proof of the unanimity of the people of Durham in favour of this Bill; but I fancy the truth is that opinion is geographically very much divided—that at

Sunderland opinion is very strong, that at Hartlepool it is the other way, and that in the city of Durham it is the other way. Unless, therefore, you provide for a much more careful examination and proof than you have done, you have no ground for, and would not be justified in, believing that the people of Durham are in favour of this Bill. If you are going to restrict the liberty of the working classes to this extent, at least ascertain that the working classes wish it. But I am told that the miners are adverse to the Bill. It seems to me very unjust that you should pass this Bill over their heads without ascertaining whether you are really acting according to their wishes. I maintain that before you act in this way you ought to make sure that you are right. What we desired to do was to create machinery by which this fact could be ascertained. I maintain that before you act in this way you are bound to create some such machinery. You are bound to do so for another reason. The very exceptional character of this legislation makes a serious grievance to the neighbourhood. You are taking a strip of country lying between two counties, and are applying this measure to Durham alone. Durham is different from other counties to which such a measure has been applied in this, that it is not separated from the adjoining county by a strong natural barrier. On the contrary, it happens to be a very unfortunate district for this kind of experiment, because there is a river to the North and a river to the South of it, and rivers have naturally attracted the mass of the industrial population, so that the population lies, as it were, in two rows at either frontier. The effect of this Bill will, of course, be simply that the publicans on the one side of the river will be ruined and the publicans on the other side will be enormously enriched, and the consumption of liquor will certainly not be less, but probably greater, than before. What we wish before all is that the real feelings and wishes of the people should be ascertained. It appears to us that the attempt to ascertain that opinion has been made in a prefatory and almost slovenly manner. Therefore, I do not feel it right to vote for this anomalous and extraordinary restrictive legislation without knowing what the real state of the case is, and I feel bound to vote on the third reading, as on the second reading, against the passing of the Bill.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Earl GRANVILLE): My Lords, I think I recognize in the arguments to-day a repetition of those employed on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill. I think great injustice has been done to the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss) and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) on the Front Bench opposite. I do not think that the promoters of temperance in the county of Durham and the country generally had the slightest notion that they were the objects of the enthusiastic admiration which both these noble Lords expressed for them. I have one remark to make with regard to the speech of the noble Lord opposite Lord Norton who spoke third in this debate. Unlike the noble Marquess, I should be glad to hear a great many speeches from a great many Peers, so that they consent to vote on my side of the question. The noble Marquess has omitted one strong argument in favour of the Bill, and it is that the right rev. Prelate has introduced a clause limiting its operation to four years. There is one defect in the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Norton), which is, that he omits the principal argument which entirely justifies the line he takes. He says he has voted against the second reading, but that he intends to vote for the third reading. Well, that seems a most inconsistent course; but the fact is that if you vote against the second reading, and vote for the third reading, you ought to have some facts which justify you. The noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss) is very consistent. If I had come in in the middle of the speech of the noble Earl, I should have thought from his unmingled indignation that the right rev. Prelate had been guilty of bringing in a Bill for the protection of vice in general. But the noble Earl opposite thought it impossible to stand out on strict principle after what had been done by the Legislature with regard to Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. The gist of the noble Marquess's argument was that it was impossible to ascertain that it was the desire of the people of Durham that the Bill should pass. He said that the noble and learned Lord on the Wool-sack had been succeeded in the representation of Durham by a Gentleman who did not approve the Bill, and that that proved what the opinion of Durham was. But the change which had taken place referred merely to the city of Durham itself. That Durham City thought differently was the ground which the noble Earl gave for proposing to except it from the operation of the Bill, but that ground was rejected by the House the other day. And when we come to the county we find that the 15 Members voted for the Bill. The noble Marquess says that the question was not before the constituency at the last Election, but I am told that there was no other question so fully before it. All the Members were pledged up to the neck to vote for the Bill, as the condition on which they were returned, and when the noble Marquess says—"Do not let us vote against the wish of the lower classes, whose feelings we do not understand," I beg to remind him that nearly all the mass of the population of Durham consists of miners, and that two of the Parliamentary Representatives are miners, and that all the Liberal Members who have been returned owed their return to the support which they got from the miners. The whole of the Roman Catholics, the whole of the Nonconformists, the whole of the clergy of the Church of England are in favour of the Bill, and that is enormous evidence of the fact stated by its supporters. I am told, too, that all the Boards of Guardians are on the same side, and therefore I am glad that the noble Marquess has laid such stress on the feeling of the people of Durham. For these reasons alone I think we are bound to vote for the third reading of the Bill.

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 70; Not-Contents 97: Majority 27.

QUESTIONS.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE CORONERSHIP OF ANTRIM.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, &c.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it a fact that, there being a vacancy in the office of Coroner for the No. 2 District of county Antrim, the High Sheriff of Antrim has announced that there will be only one polling place, viz. the town of Antrim; is he aware that from one end of the district to the other the distance is about forty miles, and that the town of Antrim is about thirty miles from one end of the district; will he take into consideration that the effect of having only one polling place will be to practically disfranchise seven-eighths of the division; having regard to the fact that the electorate is the same as for a Member of Parliament, will the Government take steps to have the voting carried out with Parliamentary polling places; and, can he say how many Parliamentary polling places are allotted to the district for which only one is to be allotted for the Coroner's election?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The facts are as stated in the Question. The fixing of a polling place or polling places for the purposes of elections to the office of Coroner is vested by law in the Justices at Special Sessions, who in this case so far back as 1847 chose the town of Antrim as the only polling place. I am advised there is no power to use in such cases the Parliamentary polling places, of which I understand there are no fewer than 12 in this district. The electorate being the same in both instances, the position is certainly anomalous; but I understand a change cannot be made unless on a requisition of five magistrates to the Lord Lieutenant. If such a requisition be presented, I think I may promise that it will be attended to.

THE MAHARAJAH DHULEEP SINGH.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh has been arrested at Aden; whether, before leaving England, he had been informed that he would not be allowed to proceed to India; and, whether any special reasons exist other than those of general policy for this treatment of the Maharajah?

THE UNDER SECRETARY MR. STAFFORD HOWARD (Gloucester, Thornbury): Yes, Sir, it is a fact that the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh has been arrested at Aden. Arrangements had been made for his residence at a place in Southern India designated by the Viceroy; but the issue by the Maharajah of an inflammatory address to the Sikh nation, added to certain other declarations by him of a somewhat menacing character, rendered it necessary, in the opinion of the Government of India, to put in force the special powers possessed by the Governor General in Council as soon as the Maharajah came within their jurisdiction at Aden. The address to the Sikhs having been issued by the Maharajah only just before his departure, the decision of the Viceroy was not known to the Secretary of State till some time after the Maharajah had left England. The Maharajah had, however, been specially warned of the powers under which the Government of India can, for purposes of State, place individuals under personal restraint.

THE ISLAND OF TRISTAN D'ACUNHA.

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the inhabitants of the Island of Tristan d'Acunha are at present in grave distress, owing to the cessation of visits from passing sailing vessels and whalers, and from other causes; whether H.M.S. Thalia, leaving England next month, is ordered to call there and land stores and other necessaries for their temporary relief; whether the inhabitants have petitioned to be removed to some other part of the Empire, where they will be enabled to obtain a livelihood; whether any estimate has been made as to the cost of the removal of the inhabitants, together with their live stock, which constitutes their chief property; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, by agreement with any Colonial Government or otherwise, can arrange for such necessary removal, and can utilise the visit of H.M.S. Thalia for making such preliminary arrangements as may be desirable?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) (Denbighshire, E.): I am afraid it is true, though we have no actual information on the subject, that the inhabitants of the Island of Tristan d'Acunha—where, owing to the loss of a whale-boat with 15 hands on board, there are scarcely any able-bodied men left—are suffering grave distress. Her Majesty's ship Thalia has orders to call there, and she carries stores and provisions for the temporary relief of the islanders. It was, in fact, partly with this object that she was commissioned. I may add that the Treasury have given £100 to be spent in supplies, and that Mr. Dodgson, the Vicar of Tristan d'Acunha, is going out in the Thalia to distribute them, the Admiralty having given him a free passage, and the Treasury having agreed to pay his messing expenses. The inhabitants have not petitioned to be removed; indeed, it is believed that the leading man among them is averse to such a step; but emigrants from the Island now in the Cape Colony have petitioned that assistance may be sent there, and Mr. Dodgson has several times asked that his parishioners might be transferred to a more accessible place. The inhabitants themselves could be removed to the Cape, the nearest British Colony, in a man-of-war, for less than £50, but no estimate has been made of the cost of moving their live stock. Unfortunately, the Government of the Cape report that the prospect of these poor people obtaining a livelihood in that Colony is hopeless. Under these circumstances, the captain of the Thalia has been instructed to ascertain and report what the inhabitants need and desire, and what had best be done for them.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—INSPECTION OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. HENRY ALLEN (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, on the inspection of Elementary Schools, the papers worked by the children could be returned with the Schedules, in order to show more clearly to the managers and schoolmasters, by the memoranda of the Inspectors, or otherwise, the points most requiring change or increased attention?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, S.): A Report drawn up by the Inspector as to the merits and defects of every school examined is sent to the Managers. To return the Papers worked by the children examined would not only entail great labour and expense, but, without special explanations, would be of no practical use.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE HOUSE LEAGUE.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (Mid-dlesex, Ealing) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the following Resolution, passed by a Branch of the House League in Tipperary, presided over by the Rev. Mr. Cantwell, C.C., and which has been extensively placarded over Tipperary town:—

"That in all cases, owing to the very great depression of the times, the Committee considers the rents of the houses excessive, and that an abatement of twenty-five per cent. should be given," and that "any civil bill officer or individual that serves notices to quit, &c. for non-payment of exorbitant rent shall incur the displeasure of the House League, and also of the Irish National League;"

and, whether the Government propose to acquiesce in this illegal and intimidatory method of depreciating the value of property?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I am informed that placards worded as given in this Question have been posted in the town of Tipperary. The language of the placard indicates, in my opinion, an improper attempt to control or interfere with individual liberty of action; and I shall ask the Law Officers of the Crown to consider whether an offence against the law is not disclosed, and whether any proceedings can be taken.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—ALLOWANCES TO LETTER SORTERS.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he has received a memorial from the letter sorters employed in the Holyhead and Kingstown Post Office, which was forwarded to him on the 20th of April last; if it is a fact that the trip allowance paid to these letter sorters is exactly the same as that paid to Railway travelling sorters; and, if the letter sorters employed on both the English and Irish Railways are in receipt of payment for Sunday work; and, if such is the case, will the Department consider, at its earliest convenience, the claim of the Holyhead and Kingstown packet sorters to be paid for Sunday work, so that they may be put on an equality with all other travelling sorters?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.): The Memorial to which the hon. Member refers has been received by the Postmaster General. The trip allowance paid to the packet sorters is at the same rate as the trip allowance paid to the railway sorters; but while the rate is the same, the profits derived from it are greater. Some few years ago it was decided that unless the trip allowance were reduced the packet sorters could not, like the railway sorters, receive payment for Sunday work. In connection with the present Memorial, however, the question is being considered afresh.

THE COLONIAL EXHIBITION—DUTIES ON FOREIGN GOLD AND SILVER PLATE.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Duties of 17s. per ounce and 1s. 6d. per ounce respectively, have been paid upon the Foreign gold and silver plate exhibited in the Colonial Exhibition; and, whether exhibitors have paid the £5 15s. charge for a Licence to deal in gold and silver plate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby) desired that the Question might be postponed.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—PALACE YARD—A GLASS SHELTER.

MR. WILLIAM BECKETT (Notts, Bassettlaw) asked the honourable Member for North West Staffordshire, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, Whether a sightly glass covering cannot be provided in Palace Yard so as to give Members on one side, and vehicles in waiting on the other, the same protection from the weather as is afforded at most Railway Stations?

MR. LEVESON GOWER (A LORD of the TREASURY, Stafford, N.W.): A glass covering, similar to that provided at railway stations, could, no doubt, be erected in Palace Yard if the House were pleased to authorize the expenditure of money for that purpose; but it is difficult to see how such an erection could be made a sightly object.

EXCISE—RICE, &c., USED IN BREWING.

COLONEL HAMILTON (Southwark, Rotherhithe) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, How far the Commissioners of Inland Revenue approve the use in brewing of saccharine, other than barley malt, such as malted rice (rice specially prepared for brewing, saccharine, &c.); and, whether such evidence as the Commissioners possess tends to show that the beer thus produced is of a lighter and less intoxicating character, when made from such materials in combination with barley malt, than from barley malt alone?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby), in reply, said, that as to the material used in brewing beer that was not a matter on which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue felt justified in offering an opinion. But there was no doubt that very good beer was made out of rice.

TARIFF AND CUSTOMS ACT—SEC. 179.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any report on the subject of section 179 of the Tariff and Customs Act had been asked for from the Commissioner of Customs, and would receive his consideration, had been received; and, what steps it is proposed to take to prevent innocent persons being convicted, which is alleged to have been the effect of that section?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby) said, that the matter referred to in the Question of the hon. Member was under consideration, and the Government proposed to legislate upon it this Session.

INDIAN INCOME TAX ACT.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the case that holders of Government of India Promissory Notes, commonly called rupee paper, resident in Great Britain, are charged not only the Income Tax in Great Britain, but also the Indian Income Tax, the two combined making a charge of one shilling and two pence in the pound; and, whether, in view of the fact that rupee paper is largely held in Great Britain, and the imposition of a double Income Tax is calculated to impair its desirability as an investment and to diminish the credit of the Indian loans in the English market, steps will be taken to relieve these loans from the double imposition in question?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. STAFFORD HOWARD, Gloucester, Thornbury): By the Indian Income Tax Act the holder of Government of India promissory notes—whose income is not less than Rs. 2,000 a-year—is liable to a tax on the interest thereon of five pies in the rupee, equal to  $6\frac{1}{4}d.$  in the pound. This, added to the  $8d.$  English Income Tax, gives a total charge of  $1s. 2\frac{1}{4}d.$  in the pound. As to the second part of the Question, it must be remembered that the interest on rupee loans is only payable in India, and that the Bank of England, when drawing in London bills on India for the payment of interest on enfaced paper, is merely acting as the agent in London of the Government of India. The Indian Income Tax Act makes no exception as to the place of residence of the person receiving interest payable in India on rupee loans, and there is no intention of making any such alteration of the Act as will exempt residents in this country.

POOR LAW—FIRES IN UNION WORK- HOUSES.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is in possession of such information as satisfies him that all Union Workhouses throughout the Country are provided with efficient means of escape for the inmates in case of fire; and, if not, whether he will instruct inquiries to be made and reports furnished to him on this subject?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. STANSFELD) (Halifax): In the early part of 1882, the attention of the Board was drawn by their Inspectors to the want of appliances in many Poor Law Institutions for meeting an outbreak of fire and insuring the safety of the inmates in the event of an outbreak occurring; and they, therefore, deemed it right in March of that year to issue a circular letter on the subject to the several Boards of Guardians in England and Wales. The Board impressed upon the Guardians the importance of always having at hand ready means of dealing with an outbreak of fire in its earliest stage, and of aiding the escape of the inmates from the buildings. They also suggested the precautions which should be taken by the master, or other responsible officer, to guard against an outbreak of fire, the arrangements for giving immediate notice of an outbreak, and the appliances which should be provided for extinguishing fire, and for aiding persons to escape when the ordinary means of exit are cut off. As the result of that circular the subject has received the special attention of Boards of Guardians generally, and the Board entertains no doubt that their suggestions have, to a large extent, been adopted. It may be added that in several instances since the issue of that circular structural alterations have been made in existing buildings with the view of facilitating the escape of the inmates. In case of plans of new buildings, which are submitted to the Board, the arrangements for escape on the occurrence of a fire are always considered by the Board. It does not at present appear to the Board that any further action on their part is necessary.

FISHERIES (ENGLAND AND WALES)— THE MORECAMBE BAY COCKLE FISHERY.

LORD EDWARD CAVENDISH (Derbyshire, W.) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the diminution in the supply of cockles from Morecambe Bay and the Estuary of the Duddon; and, considering their importance as an article of food, and the number of people employed in taking them, whether he will cause an inquiry to be held for the purpose of ascertaining what steps should be taken to protect and regulate this industry, so as to restore the supply of cockles to the markets in the adjacent populous districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. C. T. D. ACLAND) (Cornwall, Launceston) (who replied) said: It is open to the parties interested to apply to the Board of Trade, under the Sea Fisheries Acts, 1864 and 1884, for an Order for the improvement, maintenance, and regulation of a cockle fishery; and it is a portion of the procedure under such an application for the Board of Trade to appoint an Inspector to make an inquiry concerning the subject-matter of the proposed Order. No inquiry, however, can be initiated by the Board of Trade until such an application has been made.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate a Question, of which he had given him private Notice, Whether, in view of the desire of the large burghs in Scotland, mentioned in the Schedule of the Burgh Police and Health Bill, he would agree, on behalf of the Government, when the Bill was in Committee, to make it permissive so far as they were concerned?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) (Clackmannan, &c.) was understood to say that they had been told the Amendments made by the Select Committee in both Houses would have met the views of those large burghs. They understood it would be desirable to preserve the powers, at all events, in the Local Acts under this Bill; and Government were prepared, when the Bill was in Committee, to make it permissive in respect of the large burghs which had Private Acts of their own.

REGISTRATION (IRELAND)—PRODUCTION OF RATE BOOKS.

Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Tyrone, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Clogher Board of Guardians have refused the Nationalist registration agent access to the rate books for registration purposes; and, if so, whether he, as President of the Irish Local Government Board, will direct that equal facilities be given to the agents of both political parties?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne: It appears that this Board of Guardians have passed a resolution to the effect that the rate books shall not be open for the purposes of inspection or copying except at the time and in the manner provided by law. The law on the subject is laid down in Section 9 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 92, and Section 21 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 104; and so long as it is complied with the Local Government Board cannot interfere. A penalty is imposed on any person refusing to produce the rate books as required by law; and if this penalty is recovered against any Union officer, the Local Government Board might have to consider his conduct.

NAVY—WIDOWS OF SEAMEN AND MARINES.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any decision has yet been arrived at with reference to the recommendation of the Duke of Edinburgh's Committee respecting the creation of a fund for the benefit of widows of Seamen and Marines of the Fleet; and, whether, considering the fact that there is, on an average, a sum of £6,000 a-year paid into the Treasury which comes from fines, mulcts, deceased and run men's effects, slush, &c. all of which obviously belongs to the Royal Navy, he will ask the Treasury to allow this money to be devoted to the purpose recommended by the above-named Committee?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. R. W. DUFF) (Banffshire): The recommendations of the Committee have been the subject of communication between the Admiralty and the Treasury. No decision has been arrived at by the latter Department as to handing over to the Widows' Pension Fund the sum of £6,000 referred to by my hon. and gallant Friend.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE DERBY DAY—ORDER

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of putting a Question to you on a point of Order—namely, Whether you have definitely decided that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) is entitled to precedence for the Motion which he has placed upon the Paper—"That the House, at its rising, do adjourn until Thursday next?" I am aware that your Predecessor, on one occasion, did permit such a Motion to be made; but I wish to know whether that is to be regarded as a definite ruling, and, if so, whether any hon. Member can propose on any day at half-past 4 a Motion for the adjournment of the House for a prayer meeting or for any other purpose, or whether the privilege attaches peculiarly to the Derby Day? Does the privilege, in this respect, of a private Member attach only to a Motion for adjournment over the Derby Day?

MR. SPEAKER: For a long series of years it was the custom for the Government to move the adjournment of the House over the Derby Day; but of late years the Government have surrendered that privilege. By the consent of the House, and as an exception—an entire exception to the general rule—it has been thought competent for a private Member at half-past 4 to make a Motion for the adjournment of the House over the Derby Day. That was the practice followed—so far as I can recollect; but I have not been able to refer to dates in 1878, 1880, 1881, and 1883. Therefore, following the ruling of my Predecessor in this Chair, I have no hesitation in saying that the Motion of which the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has given Notice is in Order.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Perhaps I may be excused if I put another Question. You said, Sir, I think, by the consent of the House. If that is a necessary preliminary to the Motion being made, I would venture to ask how the consent of the House is to be ascertained?

MR. SPEAKER: I said that the House has already sanctioned the custom?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): You are probably aware, Sir, that in 1881 this House sat on the Derby Day and passed a Coercion Act for Ireland?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to give Notice that I shall oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere).

MOTION.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.—THE DERBY DAY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton), in moving, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Thursday next," said: I need not state that I would not have given Notice to move the adjournment of the House had I not been aware that I was perfectly in Order, and had I not learnt that the Prime Minister did not contemplate moving it himself. Sir, the tendency of the age is to reduce, as far as possible, the hours of labour of working men. Experience has proved that short hours produce more good work than long hours, and that those who take holidays do more work than those who do not. With this object we have lately frequently legislated, and established Bank Holidays. We owe, undoubtedly, our first duty to those who sent us here; but, having fulfilled that first duty, we have a second duty—which I trust we shall never forget—to ourselves. A Committee of Procedure is now sitting upstairs. I trust the result of the deliberations of that Committee will be to shorten our hours of labour. We must not forget that we hold a sacred duty from our Predecessors—to maintain the short hours of relaxation which we have received from them, and it is our duty to transmit the good which we have received from our Predecessors to our Successors. In these days of change, when institutions the most sacred are menaced, let us, at least, hold firm to something. The man who would tamper with our holidays is either a bad man, or he is a crotchety man, or he is a Scotchman. The Session now lasts habitually from the commencement of February until the commencement of September. During that time we are in the habit of adjourning twice—once at Easter, and once at Whitsuntide. But within the last 30 or 40 years exhausted nature has claimed its right, and it has been the habit to take an adjournment on some Wednesday between those ecclesiastical festivals. I need not say that while the holiday is desirable for us, it is still more desirable for you, Sir, and the officials connected with the House. You and they are obliged always to be here. We are sometimes able to snatch an hour without our country suffering for our absence. But, considering the length of the hours which the officials work here during the week, and the intelligence and zeal with which they perform their duties, it would be barbarity at which humanity really shudders to deprive them of this holiday to which they are accustomed. The holiday this year has been all the more needful than in other years. We have been discussing questions of great importance. The discussion has been a great strain upon us, and that strain will continue, very likely, for some time. We ought, therefore, to have an off-day; it will be good for us both physically and morally, and we shall be enabled to return ready to renew the discussion with great and continuous eloquence. I have looked at the Orders of the Day for to-morrow. I find the first three Orders relate to Irish Bills. I have no doubt Members interested in those Bills would be quite ready to come here and deal with them if the House wished it. But, such is their regard for the social amenities, I am inclined to think that if the House wished to adjourn they would be ready to forego that pleasure—all the more because we have now a Bill before us which, if it pass, will relegate the consideration of these Bills to a domestic Legislature in Ireland. I will point out to those who complain that we are interfering with the Business of the House; that if we were to meet to-morrow we should not do any great Business; but we should be engaged in an interesting, but somewhat academic, discussion on Irish explosives and Irish lunatics. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) asks—“Why should we take this holiday to-morrow?” My answer is—Why should we not? There are circumstances connected with to-morrow which lead me to think that if we are to have our annual holiday between Easter and Whitsuntide, to-morrow would be a very convenient day. Perhaps the House is not aware that there is a great and important meeting going on at the present time. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy says that if this Motion were allowed I might next be asking the House to adjourn for a prayer meeting. There is a prayer meeting going on now. At the present season the members of the Society of Friends have a prayer meeting which lasts about a week, and Wednesday is an important day of that meeting. We should be consulting the feelings and the wishes of the Society of Friends if we were to adjourn to-morrow. There is a further reason. I gather that on some Downs in the neighbourhood of London, at a place called Epsom, there is to be a contest between certain horses for a prize. I understand that it is an annual custom to hold this contest. Certain Gentlemen in this House take considerable interest in the amelioration of the breed of horses. They consider that these contests tend to the production of a better breed of horses, and they are anxious to be present. I would not think of putting the Motion for adjournment on that ground; but I am also told that a vast concourse of the toilers of the Metropolis are in the habit of visiting Epsom Downs on this day, making it the pretext of a picnic. They go down in trains and other vehicles, and they camp out in the open air, which at that spot, I believe, is most salubrious, and after a modest repast they return home braced up and re-invigorated. I believe there are many Members of this House who take an interest in seeing these poor people enjoying themselves in this Arcadian fashion, without knowing or caring much themselves about horse-racing; these Members are in the habit of going down and witnessing that innocent scene. I am quite aware that this national picnic has been described in other terms in this House. I know that my friend Sir Wilfrid Lawson, whose absence from the House we all regret, a man of great wisdom in other things, somehow on this particular point used to have what I may call a Derby mania, for he insisted that this was a species of orgie of drunkenness. I can assure the House from personal observation that such is not the case. I have been there myself. I have happened to find myself on the Downs on several of these occasions, and I am bound to say I have never seen a single drunkard there. [Mr. DILLWYN: Oh, oh!] I take this dissent of my hon. Friend as a compliment de viro pietate gratis. I know what the fact is, and I cannot suppose that everybody arrested their drinking when I came there, and resumed it when I went away. Certainly I saw men in excellent spirits; but they went down there to be in excellent spirits. I saw persons eating a great deal of indigestible food, which made me envy their appetites and their digestion; but I do say that, so far from being an orgie of drunkenness, there is exceptionally little drunkenness at the Derby. We must remember that we ourselves a short time ago passed an Act to establish Bank Holidays, and certainly there is not more drunkenness at the Derby than there is on a Bank Holiday. Well, Sir, as I have said, if we were asked to adjourn simply for this race, I should say that it would be rather a strong recognition of racing, to which some persons might object; but, on the other hand, I assert that if we are to have a holiday between Easter and Whitsuntide—and that, I think, is fully admitted by everyone in the House—there is no reason why we should not have a holiday to-morrow. Simply because, on the one hand, members of the Society of Friends are anxious for that day to be chosen for the most important of their meetings; and, on the other hand, Gentlemen are anxious for it to be chosen, some of whom I have no doubt are going down to this race, some simply to sympathize with the enjoyment of the multitude. These questions are not questions of principle; it is not a principle whether we will have a Wednesday this week or a Wednesday next week it is rather one of social convenience. It seems to me we ought to consult the feelings alike of political friends and of political opponents; and, though we may not entirely agree with them, if we think that any considerable number of the House do consider that one particular day would be agreeable to them, we ought to fix our holiday for that day. Sir, for these reasons I beg to move that the House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday next.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth) said, that he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion. In asking the House to adjourn over the Derby Day he did so for no purpose of his own. He was not desirous of going to the Derby, having seen it a score or more of times. He should be rather disposed to go to bed, and take the rest which the late hours of the House would not allow hon. Members to obtain, and ask his people not to disturb him until the race was run and the result could be announced. He reserved, however, his right to change his mind in that respect. But he would appeal to the House to accede to the Motion on behalf of a very considerable section of its Members who had been returned for the first time from the other side of St. George's Channel, many of whom had had no opportunity of seeing the great equine performance which would take place to-morrow. He made this appeal, too, on the ground that one good turn deserved another. His hon. Friend the Member for Waterford City (Mr. R. Power) had on no less than three previous occasions made this Motion, in order that English Members might go to the Derby; and he thought now the time had come when English Members should return the compliment, so that hon. Members from Ireland might also go. Those hon. Members were eminently deserving of a holiday, for a more hard-working, more deserving set of men was not to be found within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster; and he thought it only right that English Members should give them some respite from their labours by adjourning over to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Thursday next."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, that he was unable to make a facetious speech, and he would not attempt to make a formal speech like the hon. Member who had just sat down. He would only say one word, that he had no objection to a holiday; but he did object to this particular Wednesday being chosen for that holiday. He had no objection to people going to see the race. If this Motion was carried, perhaps he might go himself. He did not think there was any great harm in racing; but he did think there was great harm in the fact that this annual race was made a great gambling saturnalia. He had been there pretty often, and he sympathized with the multitude. With respect to what had been said about drunkenness, he could say that, although he had not seen great drunkenness at the Derby, he had seen some. In his view, this country ought not to give any public recognition to this race, but should rather set its face against it. It was a great gambling saturnalia. Not only people who went to the race, but thousands and millions of people who did not go were encouraged to begin gambling by the race; and he thought that House ought not afford its sanction to any gambling institutions. It might be said that the Stock Exchange was a greater gambling institution than the Derby, and that it was tolerated; but that was no reason why public recognition should be given to this gambling saturnalia, which affected a much larger class. For these reasons he must vote against the Motion.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [10th May]. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." — (The Marquess of Hartington.)

Debate resumed.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON (Devon, South Molton) said, that the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), and the other Members who had spoken in support of the Bill, had avoided any defence of the provisions in the Bill, and had asked the House to agree to pass this measure not upon the merits of the Bill, and not upon the question as to whether the Bill would practically be a working measure, but to accept the Bill, and, in accepting it, to accept its principle. The hon. Member for Longford said that the Irish Members accepted this Bill because it was a measure for the self-government of Ireland, and his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) wished that the verdict of the House could be given on the question of autonomy. He was bound to say, however, that his right hon. Friend was very vague and indefinite as to what autonomy meant, as he went on to speak of the inclusion of Ulster and the protection of the minority as matters of detail. For his own part, he could not discover in the Bill any intelligible principle at all. Was it local self-government? Why, they knew that hon. Members opposite laughed at and derided any remedy in the direction of County Boards and local self government. Was it Home Rule? Well, it was not Home Rule in the sense in which Home Rule had been applied to, and existed in, any of our responsible self-governing Colonies. The Secretary of State for War it was, he believed, who had spoken of the great change which had taken place in the Colonies since the grant to them of autonomy—how they had been converted from disloyalty to loyalty. He (Viscount Lynton) had travelled in the Colonies, and he had found that there was nothing to which the Colonists attached more importance than the power to manage their own commercial concerns. That was a power which by the Bill was deliberately and most remarkably refused to Ireland. Much had been said of the effect of the measure on the Empire; but he desired to deal with the question as it affected the social condition of the Irish people. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), to whose support the Prime Minister attached so much importance, advocated the passing of the Bill, if he rightly interpreted his speech, because it was desired and supported by the vast majority of the Irish Representatives; but if they were to press this argument to its logical result, if they were to pass this measure because the majority of the Irish Members of the day wished for it, they would, upon precisely the same grounds, have to support any further measure which went for absolute separation. The hon. Member for Bedford and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) asked them to accept this Bill because they believed it would be likely to lead to a settlement of the Irish Question. Why, we had been settling the Irish Question for the last 30 years. Every piece of land legislation had been introduced in the hope and upon the assurance of its being final. Upon that plea, as a justification and as a supreme reason, the Land Act of 1870 had been accepted; but within 11 years of the passing of that Act social order had been convulsed, and under the pressure of the most violent agrarian agitation Parliament had been forced in 1881 to re-open the whole question of the land. They heard in the debates from 1870 to 1881 most eloquent speeches—and if eloquence and sanguine prophecies could make a country prosperous how prosperous would Ireland be—from Irish Members and from the Prime Minister, putting before the House the view that these measures would bring peace, goodwill, and contentment to the Irish people, and would make Ireland a prosperous country. He himself had been earnestly in favour of that legislation, and he believed it had conferred great benefits on Ireland. But whatever merits or benefits that legislation possessed the experience of the Land Acts did not encourage them to believe that this measure would be a final settlement; and it was a dangerous course to deal with a great political question on trivial grounds, with the probability of having to reconsider the whole relations of the Irish to the English people in a few years' time. The Bill was so far from possessing the elements of permanence that it bristled with opportunities for future irritation between the two countries. First of all, there was the question of the two Orders; and hon. Members who sat below the Gangway, and those who were the mainstay of the Prime Minister with regard to this Bill, spoke, he might say, in terms of derision of this proposal for the two Orders. Eloquent speeches had been made in support of the right of the Irish people to autonomy. If they conceded that right, why had they not given them autonomy? This Bill did not give them autonomy. It surrounded the so-called autonomy which it gave with innumerable restrictions. There was not a single responsible Colony that would accept such a Constitution at our hands. It would be scouted by Australia and New Zealand. There was nothing so much prized by Victoria and Canada as the liberty which they possessed of framing their own commercial system. Then the question of finance had not as yet been adequately discussed. We imposed a tribute on Ireland of £4,500,000 without having previously ascertained whether Ireland was in debt to Great Britain, or Great Britain to Ireland. In 1853 the present Prime Minister laid an Income Tax on Ireland. That policy was opposed at the time not only by Irish Members, but also by English Members of high standing, among whom was Sir Francis Baring, who, on the 28th of May, 1853, stated that whereas England had received a relief of £1,040,000 she was imposing upon Ireland an additional impost of £413,000. They had heard at various times many complaints from the Irish Members of the manner in which Ireland contributed an unfair proportion to Imperial taxation. He was not going into the question as to whether Ireland contributed more than she ought, or whether Ireland was over-taxed; but he said it was absolutely necessary, before fixing Ireland's contribution to the Revenues of the two Kingdoms, that we should know precisely how we stood in this matter. There had been no sufficient investigation of the poverty of the country. The hon. Member for Longford had shown with considerable force the deplorable industrial condition of his country. What were the facts? He had taken the years before the commencement of the present agitation, which had not been affected by an exceptional state of things, and he found that between 1861 and 1881 the population had diminished by more than 600,000—from 5,798,000 to 5,159,000. During the time specified the only increase had been in the agricultural class, and that increase had been chiefly in the congested districts. The industrial class had decreased over 129,000; in this industrial class the great decrease had been in persons dealing with textile fabrics; and in this section the decrease had been over 106,000. He was afraid that this state of things was not likely to improve under the conditions of the Bill. He had heard on absolutely reliable authority that two large houses of business in Belfast had made arrangements to move to Scotland. [Cries of "Name!"] It was not necessary to give the names; but he should be willing to communicate privately with any hon. Member who challenged the accuracy of the statement. The number of persons engaged in the woollen trade had steadily decreased. Take the years 1841 to 1871. They had decreased from 78,000 to 20,000. Those figures were an index, and an eloquent index, to the deplorable condition of the country. True, this decline had occurred under the Union; but the figures showed that what Ireland and the Irish people wanted were not political but social remedies. The hon. Member for Longford rightly urged the importance of developing technical education. Ireland required to have its industries revived, and railways made to develop the industries, and especially to develop the fishing industry. But under this Bill the Irish people would not be able to undertake the social regeneration of their country, for, according to the Prime Minister, the estimated balance of the Irish Parliament would be only a little over £400,000. It was not surprising that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), during the course of this debate, said on this point—

"(Of course, I understand that he (Mr. Gladstone) was anxious to make the best bargain he could for England; . . . but he should also remember that Ireland is a very poor country, and that, with such a small balance as he showed on the Budget of £400,000 a-year, it will be impossible for Ireland to have any credit for floating loans. Irish landlords now can borrow money . . . for the improvement of their estates; Irish tenants can borrow money for improving their farms; local bodies can borrow money for sanitary purposes within their jurisdiction. All these are very important matters. But we shall have to surrender all these under the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman."—(3 Hansard, [304] 1131.)

What security would the Irish Government, which this Bill purported to create, have to raise money upon? They would have no security upon which to raise money except by the rating of real property. If they attempted to do this, he ventured to say they would be encountered by very great difficulties. Irish constituencies would put pressure upon their Members probably for a large measure of outdoor relief; at all events, one of the first considerations that would be forced upon the Irish Parliament would be the poverty of the country. Then the Irish Government would be confronted by the religious difficulty. Although the Irish people were so poor, they entirely supported their own Church. Such a voluntary rate came to be practically an obligatory rate; and if the Government put a heavy rate on real property they would provoke the resistance of a very powerful interest—the Catholic Church. In other countries local self-government had produced difficulties of taxation, and State after State in the American Union had been induced to place the strongest limitations upon borrowing and rating powers. Ireland, unlike the Colonies, had not got unlimited land or unlimited capabilities. Irish Members might be quite honest in saying that Ireland would not rush into wild excesses; but he ventured to say the Irish Parliament would have to resist very considerable pressure. They had seen it in that House, where the Government of the day, whether Liberal or Conservative, were subject to very considerable pressure by Gentlemen below the Gangway, who wanted to make considerable demands on the public purse. He ventured to say the Irish Government would have to resist, without the same force of resistance, very heavy attacks upon its public purse. If real property were recklessly encroached upon in order to meet demands for local purposes, what would become of the revenue reserved for the police—[An hon. MEMBER: Do without them.]—poor relief, and education? An hon. Member said they could do without police; but even supposing that the passing of this Bill removed agrarian crimes, it could not alter human nature, and there existed no Government in the world which could dispense with the primary and indispensable means of maintaining the authority of law and order. But upon whose shoulders would fall the burden of that insolvency which must result from this Bill? If the Irish Government became bankrupt English and Scotch taxpayers would again be called upon for money. They did not, under this Bill, relieve themselves of the responsibility. They abandoned the power, but they retained the responsibility; and he said that if under this measure they were to create an Irish Parliament and an Irish Executive, without the means to carry on the Government, they would find the English taxpayer and the Scotch taxpayer would again be called upon to subscribe the money. The Prime Minister was mistaken in his diagnosis of the disease. The great difficulty in Ireland was not political, but social. At the root of the difficulties were the soil, the climate, and the habits of the people. No political movement since Catholic Emancipation had excited any degree of enthusiasm in Ireland. The movement of Smith O'Brien in 1848 was only part of the general movement against the state of things created in 1815. So social was the impulse that led to that movement that he did not believe the abortive battle of Slievenagamon would have been fought but for the distress in Skibbereen. Mr. O'Leary, who, although he had undergone a sentence for treason-felony, he (Viscount Lymington) believed to be an honest man, who certainly was the only conspicuous figure in that movement, was firmly of opinion that the political measures which they were now discussing were not the remedies which Ireland required. The abortive attempt to capture Chester 20 years ago was hardly a political movement. Mr. Davitt was the leader of a Socialist rather than a political movement. Whatever enthusiasm was created by the Disestablishment of the Irish Church was religious. It was due to the fact that the Act put an end to the supremacy of one section of the Irish people over another section. At present, and in consequence of the Liberal policy in the past, there exists in Ireland absolute religious equality. The Bill would destroy this great work of the Liberal Party. The 4th clause of the Bill provided that the Irish Legislature should not make any law respecting the establishment or the endowment of religion, for prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or conferring any privilege upon any denomination; but he found that Clause 19, Section 2, placed the subject at the mercy of the Catholic majority in the Catholic Parliament, who, notwithstanding that the Irish Legislature was prohibited by this Bill from making laws relating to certain subjects, might, with the assent of Her Majesty in Council first obtained, appropriate any amount of the Irish public Revenue, or any tax or duty imposed by such Legislature for the purpose, or in connection with such subjects. ["No, no!"] Well, the Bill said so. The point was that "the assent of Her Majesty in Council" should be given. Who was Her Majesty in Council? If hon. Members referred to Clause 7 they would find that the power vested in Her Majesty was to be carried out by the Lord Lieutenant. But Clause 27 provided that the Lord Lieutenant might be a Catholic; and who were the Council? He found no definition of the Council, or, if there were one, it was in Clause 2, where it said that with the exception of the restrictions mentioned in the Bill it should be lawful for Her Majesty, by and with the advice of the Irish Legislative Body, to make laws. Under this Bill, Clause IV., which was introduced into the measure with the apparent intention of preventing the Catholic Parliament from establishing and endowing the Catholic Church, was entirely controverted and set at nought by the clause which decreed that the Lord Lieutenant, whom the Bill expressly enabled to be a Roman Catholic, acting with the Irish Ministry, who would be the creatures of a Roman Catholic Parliament, was able to override and practically to make what laws in these matters he pleased. He should be glad if his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would clear up these points. They had no definition of what the Council was to be, and he should like to have the question he had put answered. He looked at the Bill as it stood, and it seemed to him that under it the protection and the rights of the Protestants of Ulster were entirely destroyed. The hon. Member for Longford said that if the Bill passed the Irish Parliament would not be a Parliament of politicians. He did not know what the hon. Member for Longford meant by that; he supposed that he meant it would be a Parliament of Irishmen; and in that sense he thought it was very likely that it would be a Parliament the objects of which would not be political; but he was convinced that it would be a Parliament of men who would use their political machinery for social objects. Where would hon. Members be but for the Land Question? Where would the hon. Member for Monaghan be but for the Healy Clause? The National League was not only the successor, but it was the Land League with an altered name. The Nationalist seats in Ulster were carried, not by the cry of Home Rule, but by the cry of the land. The Bill did not attempt to deal with the social question. There was no reference in it to the 200,000 small holdings in Ireland which represented so much woe, misery, and poverty. The idea of home in the mind of the cottagers in the South and West of Ireland, of those who formed the majority of the Nationalist Party, was not Ireland, but the plot of ground on which they were born and lived. Their patriotism was not the patriotism of Ireland, but the patriotism of the church steeple. The Bill could not settle the main root of the Irish Question. That had always been—that was to-day—agrarian. That fearful difficulty could only be met and dealt with by the Imperial Parliament; and whatever might be the ultimate future relation of classes in Ireland, it could not allow this agrarian question, or expect this question to be satisfactorily settled by the Irish Parliament. Then there was the question of finance. The British taxpayers were making great sacrifices, and he believed the English and Scotch taxpayers would make great sacrifices to settle the Irish Question; but they must feel they had some real security for their money. Such security they could not get under any scheme for the social regeneration of Ireland, unless they retained the purse strings and the power in the hands of the Imperial Parliament. The real causes of the distress in Ireland were world-wide. They were neither of exclusively Irish, nor even of exclusively British origin. Ireland was essentially an agricultural country; and the depression in the prices of agricultural produce, which was at the bottom of all the honest inability to pay rent in Ireland, was felt as strongly and as cruelly in many parts of the Continent and in many parts of Britain as it was in Ireland. Doubtless there were in Ireland dishonest combinations to prevent the payment of rent; but there were great numbers of honest Irish farmers who had not been able to get their lawful rent out of the ground; and this not through their fault or through the fault of the ground so much as from the fact, which people refused to recognize, that the agricultural interest throughout Europe was swamped by an enormous increase of cheaper supplies from the outlying countries of the world. How to meet this great and growing tide, which threatened to drown out the agricultural industries of Europe, was a question requiring the most extensive knowledge of commerce and finance, the widest experience, and the highest impartiality. What could be more absurd than to confide such a problem to a local vestry under a Bill which forbade it any control over the Customs, over the currency, over trade, navigation, and finance? The Bill forbade the mock Parliament it pretended to create from dealing, either wisely or unwisely, with a single one of the great essential elements of a country's prosperity. The hon. Member (Mr. Dillon) said—

"An enormous responsibility rested on the shoulders of any man who would send them back to the suffering people of Ireland with the winter approaching, and empty-handed."

Empty-handed! Why, this Bill would send them back to Ireland, not only empty-handed, but with their empty hands tied behind their backs. They were threatened with a Dissolution. The hon. Member for Northampton Mr. Labouchere had threatened many hon. Members with the loss of their seats. That was a threat which he was able to bear with perfect complacency. He appreciated and valued highly the honour of a seat in the House; he valued the support and the sympathy of his constituents—and he believed that he had their support in the line he was now taking; but he ventured to say that he would rather lose his seat in the House than accept it upon the terms which some hon. Members wished to impose. It had been said that a great responsibility rested on the shoulders of those who opposed the Bill. Great as that responsibility, no doubt, was, it was trifling as compared with that of those who had altered their opinions and yet had not changed their convictions. If some of those who opposed the Bill lost their seats, they would prefer to do so rather than become the humble and blind adherents of a policy which he was convinced was bad for Ireland, certain to lead to impossible relations between it and this country, fatal to the supremacy of Parliament, and to the efficiency and authority of the British Empire.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir CHARLES RUSSELL) (Hackney, S.): The noble Lord, with his usual ability, has gone through many of the topics that have been referred to by previous speakers; but I am sorry to say that he has marred, to some extent, the effect of his speech by claiming for himself that he was acting in the course which he was now taking on high principles and honest convictions, while at the same time he did not acknowledge that those who differed from him were actuated equally with himself by high motives. I confess I am a little puzzled to know what the noble Lord means when he speaks of men changing their opinions without changing their convictions, because I thought a man's convictions depended upon his opinions; and if he changed his convictions, that he must necessarily change his opinions. The noble Lord said that he was unable to discover what the principle of this Bill is. I will endeavour, in the course of a few minutes, to enlighten him on this point. He said that the Parliament of this country has been for very many years trying to settle the Irish Question. As an Irishman, I gratefully admit that this Parliament has devoted much time to the consideration of the Irish Question; and I think that a great part of the Members of this House have approached this question with a desire to deal with Ireland in a just and even a generous spirit. But what have been the characteristics of the legislation which has in the main been passed? It has been marked by two faults. The fault is that, as a rule, it came too late; and the second fault, and the more serious one, is that the benefits which you have offered to Ireland in the way of legislation are not what the Irish people wanted, not what their Representatives wanted, but what you, the majority of Representatives in this House from England and Scotland, thought they ought to want. But while the noble Lord has made a speech of some interest on this matter, I confess that he has left me in doubt as to what are the real grounds of his objection to the Bill. Like a great many speeches which have been addressed to the House, the noble Lord has left me in doubt whether his objection to the Bill was not that it gave too little power to the Irish Legislative Body; because it has been a curious characteristic of a great many speakers that, having dwelt in one part of their speeches on the powers given to the Legislative Assembly in Ireland in order to base upon it the argument—the futile argument, as I believe—that the supremacy of this House was invaded, they have immediately turned round, and, with the view of exciting a spirit of discontent among the Irish Members, they have maintained that, after all, it was a miserable semblance of self-government that was being given to Ireland, so “cribbed, cabined, and confined” was it. Again, I am at a loss to understand whether the noble Lord is objecting, as regards the financial view of this question, that the amount of tribute which Ireland is to pay is too much or too little. In a great portion of his speech the noble Lord dwelt on the poverty—I am afraid it is too true, speaking of a large portion of the community—of the Irish people, and the noble Lord’s conclusions seemed to point in the direction that the tribute was fixed at too high a figure. But the noble Lord will assist the Irish Members if he succeeds in inducing the House and the Government to take that view, and I have no doubt the Irish Members will be grateful to him if he does so. The only other point which the noble Lord referred to was the conflict, as he thought, which exists between Clause 4 and Clause 19 of the Bill; and the noble Lord came to the conclusion, by a reference which was not accurate to other parts of the Bill, that Her Majesty in Council, in Clause 19, referred to the Irish Council. The noble Lord will, I hope, take my assurance that this is not so. I will give this further assurance to the noble Lord—that if those two clauses as they stand confer a power on the Irish Legislative Body, contrary to Clause 4, to endow any religion in Ireland, Her Majesty’s Government will be glad of the assistance of the noble Lord to remove all uncertainty on the point. I now turn from the speech of the noble Lord to make some general observations. I recollect in the debate on the introduction of the measure that, following the example set me in other parts of the House, I made in truth a second-reading speech. I will not go over the ground which I then trod. I would prefer, without repeating those general arguments with which I then endeavoured to justify to the House the necessity for dealing with this question, and the necessity for such a Bill as this, to come as speedily as I may to the objections made in various quarters to the Bill. Before I do that it will be necessary on my part to classify the objections, because such classification is essential to the right understanding of this question. I should also wish to put before the House with precision what I conceive to be the cardinal and the essential principle of the Bill, upon the rejection or the acceptance of which on the part of the House must depend the question whether the vote is to be “Aye” or “No” on the second reading. What, then, is the cardinal principle of this Bill? The cardinal principle of this Bill, as I conceive it to be, is that it seeks to establish a Legislative Body in Ireland which shall have legislative and administrative functions, and to which the Irish Executive shall be responsible. I admit that as regards all Members of this House who are opposed to the granting of legislative powers to Ireland in any shape, or under any conditions and subject to any safeguards, the Government can say nothing to induce them to vote for this measure. But that is the dividing line. And equally I claim from all who are in favour, under safeguards and under conditions, of granting a legislative power to a Legislative Assembly in Ireland their vote on the second reading of the Bill, even though it be that their support at the later stages of this Bill may depend on the adequacy and character of the safeguards and the conditions by which this legislative power is to be accompanied. It is obvious that in this I say nothing that is new. I am merely relating what has been said by the Prime Minister, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the Secretary of State for War. Now, I come to the classification of the objectors. First, there are hon. Gentlemen representing the great Party opposite. There is no doubt about their opposition, and I make no pretence to claim their vote in favour of the second reading. But the air is a good deal clearer in regard to this matter. We now know what is the view and what is the policy of the Party opposite. We know now that, in addition to the famous declaration of policy of the 26th of January, which meant suppression of the National League—[Opposition cheers—] we have the supplementary or the complementary policy of 20 years of “resolute” administration of the law. I observe that that observation has not been so loudly applauded by hon. Gentlemen opposite as that regarding the suppression of the National League. I must not for one moment describe that policy as an announcement of a coercive policy. It would be to offend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury, who gave expression to it; but he seems to have since recoiled from that interpretation of his policy as if affrighted

“At the sound himself had made.”

The second class of objectors are those led by my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen). I have tried; but I have found myself at last compelled to admit that it is exceedingly difficult to draw any very clear line of demarcation between their position and the position of at least a great many hon. Members belonging to the Party opposite. I find that the noble Marquess, in a speech at Bradford the other day, said that he had always felt strong objections to even making the attempt to give Ireland the management of her own affairs. It results from further declarations of the noble Marquess that the greatest concession he finds himself able—acting, as we all know, from the highest and most conscientious motives—to make to the demands of this occasion and to the desire of Ireland for national self-government is what I must describe as a series of homœopathic doses of local government to be administered at intervals of good behaviour. I admit that that is perfectly consistent with the noble Marquess's attitude on this question. But I come to another class of objectors, who I confess perplex me much. I mean those who may be said to be represented by my right hon. Friends the Members for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). I have some difficulty in realizing exactly what are the grounds of their objections to the principle of this Bill, if I am right in stating what that principle is. I have stated its principle to be the concession of a Legislative Assembly in Ireland with legislative and administrative functions; and I find that the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, referring to the distinction—the broad and grave distinction—between his own position and theirs, said the other day that both of those right hon. Gentlemen were in favour—I am quoting his words—of conceding to Ireland a large measure of autonomy. We have not yet been informed what those right hon. Gentlemen mean by this concession to Ireland of a large measure of autonomy. I will not stop to discuss—it would be impertinent to do so—the etymological meaning of autonomy. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), who the other night made a very able speech, said that autonomy might mean anything, from power to deal with a Gas Bill up to power of absolute self-government, ending, it might be, in separation. I want to know in what sense, or in which of these various senses, the word autonomy was there used? The word is commonly understood and generally accepted among politicians as meaning powers of self-government; and the time has come, I think, when we should have some authoritative statement from those two right hon. Gentlemen as to the meaning they attach to this term. I would remind the House that as far back as the year 1874 my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham expressed himself strongly—the word was not then autonomy—in favour of Home Rule for Ireland, and that he coupled that statement with the further statement that one advantage that he would expect to derive from it would be this—that proceedings in this Parliament would move at a quicker pace; that they then moved only at the rate of what he called the Parliamentary train—that was not quick enough for him; and that he expected the pace to be increased in the absence of the Irish Members. I think we have a right to know whether my right hon. Friend has changed his views on that point, and his grounds for changing them. We know that since that time, in 1885, the right hon. Gentleman put before the country a scheme which might be shortly described as a scheme for County Boards, plus Provincial or National Councils; but we also know that that scheme is confessed by its author to be now behind the exigencies of the occasion, because the House will remember that on the occasion of the explanation given by my right hon. Friend of the reasons why he left the Cabinet he used this remarkable language—

“Those National Councils I, for one, am not likely to put forward again. I no longer regard that scheme as a solution.”

And he went on to say that after the proposals of the Government—

“It is only a very large proposal which can, at any future time, be accepted as a solution of this vast question. I shall look for the solution in the direction of federation.”—3 Hansard, [304] 1207-8

It has been again and again pointed out that federation presupposes Legislative Assemblies to federate; and I would point out to my right hon. Friend two things—first, that if he thinks the time is ripe for any such scheme of federation, or may be in the course of a few years ripe for it, this Bill, if it becomes law, will be no bar, but rather an aid, to its adoption. I am pronouncing no opinion on that scheme of federation, if the country should see fit to adopt it. But my right hon. Friend is a practical politician, and I want to point out to him that things are in this condition as regards Legislative Assemblies to be federated, or as regards the state of opinion in the Colonies and in England and Scotland on the question—that it is impossible to hold out the least prospect that within any reasonable time a scheme of federation will be ripe for practical application. And I want to ask, is this question of Irish government, of Irish social order, of doing something to satisfy the national demand so long persisted in, and now so urgent, to stand over to any such remote period? And if it is not, I have to ask my two right hon. Friends, both of them eminent politicians, both of them practical men, what is the practical scheme which they suggest for dealing at this time and in the necessity of the case with this urgent question? Well, one great point that has been urged by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham is the question of the exclusion of the Irish Members from this House. I want the House to allow me to follow out the idea of the argument based on the exclusion of the Irish Members. In the first instance, let me draw the attention of those who are impressed with this point to the fact that the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale has gone the length of declaring that the grafting on this Bill of a provision for the inclusion of the Irish Members would make the Bill, in his judgment, infinitely worse than it is. This was made a little clearer the other night; and I want to ask those who look for light and leading from the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for West Birmingham and the Border Burghs, have they noticed this declaration? My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness, the other night, made this still more clear, because he said, in effect—“Graft on this Bill a provision for the inclusion of the Irish Members, and that provision, with the consequential alterations, will make it such a Bill as to be universally acceptable on this side of the House.” Now, I want to know this—had my hon. Friend warrant for that statement? Or did it mean—what it must have meant—that if it satisfied the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, who was against all legislative authority being given to an Assembly in Ireland—if it satisfied the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh, who is dead against any power to a Legislative Body in Ireland—it would have been the abandonment and destruction of the vital and cardinal principle of the Bill. [Mr. Goschen: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Member for East Edinburgh, I observe, cheers that as being a correct statement of the case. Again, I make my appeal to those hon. Members who desire to see effect given, with the safeguards which they consider adequate, to the principle of a Legislative Assembly in Ireland; I want them to note the fact that the only concession which would conciliate the opposition to which I have adverted is a concession that would destroy the Bill. Well, but my difficulty in this matter does not even end here; because what have we learnt through the ordinary sources of information? As I have pointed out, the views of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and the right hon. Member for the Border Burghs are widely divergent from those of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale and the right hon. Member for East Edinburgh. Yet we were informed that on the occasion of the sealing and signing of the Devonshire House compact they were in "substantial accord." The hon. Baronet the Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Sir Henry Meysey-Thompson), in the diversity of opinion that appeared to have prevailed, is reported to have asked the question whether the noble Lord and the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had agreed on an alternative policy; and the answer that was given, according to the published accounts in the newspapers—first by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, and afterwards assented to by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham—was, "Yes; we are in substantial accord." I want to know what is the basis of the settlement?

SIR HENRY MEYSEY-THOMPSON (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that that is not quite a correct account of what took place. I did not ask whether an agreement had been arrived at, but whether it was not time that some agreement should be thought of; and, as far as I remember, the answer of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham was that the question was premature.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: The hon. Gentleman's statement throws a very curious light upon what was passing. For my own part, I have no knowledge of the matter except that which appears in the newspapers. But does the right hon. Member for West Birmingham mean that the only basis of action and of concert between himself and the noble Lord is the desire to wreck the fortunes of this Bill? Does that concert and that action rest upon that hoped-for wreck as their main support and prop; and does the right hon. Member mean that the object of those who oppose this Bill is with that wreck to drive this Government from power in order to allow the advent to power of the Party opposite, or of a Government which shall be supported by that Party? Do the opponents of this measure prefer the homœopathic policy of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, or do they prefer the more robust policy of the noble Marquess who leads the Conservative Party? These are questions which it is desirable to have answered. Now, I will turn from these objectors to an entirely different class of objectors—I mean to those who desire to give legislative powers, under what they consider to be the proper safeguards and conditions, to a Legislative Assembly in Ireland—in other words, to a class of objectors who do not base their objections on matters of detail in order to hide and to cloak their objections to the principle of the Bill, but who are honestly criticizing the Bill, to the principle of which they are favourable. To such objectors let me in a few words endeavour to state plainly how this Bill, if it becomes law, will be likely to work as a practical measure. And, in doing this, let me assure the House that I will not condescend to argue this question as though the Irish nation were to be treated as a nation of fools or of criminals. I claim, in forecasting their probable course of action, the right of the Irish nation to be regarded as a people having a fair share of natural acuteness, and of such intelligence as will enable them to deal with their own interests and concerns in a practical and business-like manner. With reference to the proposal for having two Orders in the Irish Parliament, I do not defend that as a very symmetrical or logical arrangement; but I look upon it as an arrangement not suggested by the judgment of the Prime Minister, but rather proposed as a concession to the fears, which I believe to be ill-founded, of hon. Members which have found expression in this House. I should like to point to the alternative way—or perhaps I should say the contradictory way—in which the question of safeguards and conditions has been presented to the House. There is one class of men who say that this measure will create an Irish Parliament with absolute power which will lead to the disruption of the Empire and the separation of the Kingdoms, and that, therefore, the power of the Imperial Parliament will vanish into air. On the other hand, there is a class of men who say that the safeguards which have been introduced into this Bill show a great distrust on the part of the Government of the new Body they are about to create. Hit high or hit low, it is impossible to please. The truth is that they do not want to be pleased. If we show them that the Irish Parliament will not be a co-ordinate Parliament with the Imperial Parliament, but subordinate to it, they say that we shall not satisfy Ireland; and if we show them that we have given Ireland in such subordinate Legislative Assembly full practical scope, they say that we are about to do that which is fatal to the integrity of the Empire and the supremacy of this Parliament. With regard to the veto to be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant, it is true that it is to be exercised constitutionally by the Lord Lieutenant on the advice of his Irish Ministers; but he is appointed by the Crown, and may refer to the Advisers of the Crown, at whose instance he is appointed. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Inverness appears to think that great difficulties will arise with reference to a possible conflict of judicial decisions upon the Acts that might be passed by the Irish Legislative Body. These questions will ultimately be decided by Her Majesty's Privy Council sitting in London. My hon. and learned Friend appears to think that it is a strange thing that the exercise of authority by a Legislative Body should be subject to judicial interpretation; but that must always be the case where there is either a written Constitution or a subordinate statutory Parliament. I listened with pleasure to the graceful periods of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James); but I must confess that I was more pleased with the grace and eloquence of his remarks than I was impressed by his legal argument. My right hon. and learned Friend said—

"The real unity of a Kingdom must depend upon the unity of its laws. I do not mean by that that there must be identity of laws. . . . It is not the identity of manufacture; it is the identity of the manufacturing power that makes the unity of a Kingdom."—(3 Hansard, [305] 916.)

I should wish to ask my right hon. and learned Friend whether there is any distinction between a united Kingdom and a united Empire? There is none except that in the one case there is a King or a Queen, and in the other an Emperor or an Empress as the Executive Head. It will be sufficient for my purpose to point out that in this Empire there are something like 30 distinct Legislative Bodies, which are practically absolute within their own limits and within their own constitution. But my right hon. and learned Friend went on to say that if this Bill passes the unity of the Kingdom would be gone, because there would be two co-equal Legislative Bodies. But it follows from the very creation of a subordinate Legislative Assembly that the Parliament which creates such Assembly—the Parliament which sits at Westminster—will still have paramount control on all questions, and exclusive control on Imperial questions, while that in Ireland will merely have power to deal strictly with Irish questions. In other words, let me ask whether, if at the time of the Union it had been decided that the Imperial Parliament should have power over Imperial concerns, and that the Irish Parliament should have power over Irish affairs, we should have had a less united Kingdom than we shall have if this Bill passes? I cannot but help hearing the observation which has just been made by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), although I do not think that it was intended to reach my ears. The noble Lord says that this is a mere point of special pleading. I can assure the noble Lord that nothing was further from my intention than to offer to the House a point of special pleading. In my opinion, my argument does not involve, but disposes of a point of special pleading. Now I come to another point, and that is the great contention of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James), and of the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), that this Parliament ceases to be a paramount Parliament, and that the authority vested in the new Parliament to be created makes it a co-ordinate Parliament. The suggestion my right hon. and learned Friend makes fails to have very much practical weight for two reasons. First of all, because my right hon. and learned Friend and my hon. and learned Friend did not commit themselves as a matter of legal opinion to the fact that it was so, and I should indeed be surprised if they had; and, in the next place, my right hon. and learned Friend and my hon. and learned Friend go on to say, almost in the same breath, that even if their suggestion is not well founded, that if, as a fact, this Parliament retains the paramount authority, their objection holds equally strong, for it is not intended that the paramount authority should constantly intervene. The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) made this very clear. He said—

“It does not, in my opinion, matter whether from the point of view of Constitutional lawyers Parliament will still have the power to legislate on Irish matters or not.”

That coming from the noble Lord is intelligible and perfectly consistent with the noble Lord's general attitude, and means nothing else but that the noble Lord is against the principle of any concession of legislative power to Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) said, and with my hon. and learned Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bryce) has made it clear what was the intention of the framers of this Bill. From what they have said, there can be no doubt remaining as to what those intentions are. What is meant is this—that this Bill is the expression of what, for want of a better phrase, may be called a Parliamentary compact, by which it is intended that the Irish people shall have the exclusive right to deal with matters that concern themselves, and that Parliamentary compact, solemnly made and solemnly entered into, is to be as solemnly observed. But there remains inherent in this Parliament a paramount authority, of which it cannot, if it would, divest itself—a reserve force not intended to be used, but which exists for use in any grave emergency. I may observe in passing that this Bill leaves untouched all the six reasons upon which Mr. Pitt based his arguments for the necessity of the Union.

I want to make it clear that not one of the reasons which Mr. Pitt gave as a necessity for the Act of Union is touched. They are all reserved for this Parliament, and none of them can be dealt with by the Legislative Assembly in Ireland. But the exclusion of Irish Members from this House is complained of. Sir, if those who so complain mean that they require their presence here in their present numbers at all times and for all purposes—if they insist upon that, then it is because they object to the concession of any legislative power to Ireland. No one has suggested that it is practicable or right to give the Irish Members in their full strength power to deal with affairs that concern them in Ireland, and also to give them the right to meddle with the affairs of Englishmen and Scotchmen. The Prime Minister has made this clear, and I could not hope to make it clearer. I can only say that if any practicable scheme could be suggested which would not bring confusion upon this Parliament, and by which the presence of some at least of the Irish Members could be secured, the Prime Minister has said—and it has been repeated by other Members of the Cabinet—that the Government are anxious and desirous to favour such a scheme. I now come to the question of Ulster, which, as I am an Ulster man myself, I should like to say a word or two upon. I believe that the objections that come from Ulster are in part objections by persons who really entertain, as I believe, utterly unfounded fear; but I believe that by far the greater volume of noise and protest that comes from Ulster is a manufactured thing. It consists of a good deal of bluster and a good deal of bunkum; but this House need not be very much frightened when it recalls to its recollection that at least as strong opinions were expressed, and as violent sentiments uttered, in 1868, when Parliament was proposing to deal with the Irish Church. My right hon. and learned Friend the senior Member for the University of Dublin Mr. Plunket, of whom I desire to speak in terms of the greatest personal respect, used language on that occasion which, coming from a man like my right hon. and learned Friend, and viewed in the light of what has since happened, sounds absurd and ridiculous.

[Sixth Night.]

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said—

"I appeal to our brother Protestants in England, Scotland, and Wales to stand by us in this the last awful hour of our fortune. And we call upon them not to drive us again to that old kind of material physical resistance which accompanied the first protest of our fathers three centuries ago, which accompanied the second protest in this Kingdom of our fathers 200 years ago, which accompanied the glorious struggle for liberty and Protestantism of our predecessors, and whose protest, by act and word, they were willing to seal with their blood in martyrdom and battle."

It was not only a gentleman of high character and attainment like my right hon. and learned Friend who used that language, but just as there now are the Rev. Mr. Hanna and the Rev. Mr. Kane, so in 1867 there were clerics, preaching, forsooth! a gospel of peace, who indulged in anticipations similar to those I have quoted. The Rev. Mr. Ferrers and the Rev. Mr. Ellis then used language like that of the hon. Member for Ballykilbeg—I beg his pardon—for Belfast (Mr. Johnston), who is not exactly cast in a martial mould, but whose language breathes blood and thunder. In 1868 Mr. Ferrers, speaking at Rathmines, said—

"If the Church Establishment be destroyed in Ireland, there must not—there shall not—be peace in Ireland. If they think that the Protestants of Ireland will succumb without a struggle they know not the men with whom they have to deal. If they want us to die as martyrs we will die as soldiers first."

The Rev. Thomas Ellis, of New Bliss, speaking at the same time, also insisted upon dying. He said—

"We will fight as men alone can fight who have the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other; we will fight—nay, if needs be, we will die as our fathers died before us, die as our sons will die who succeed us—yes, we will die if needs be, and this will be our dying cry, echoed and re-echoed from earth to Heaven and from one end of Ulster to the other. 'No Popery, no surrender.'"

It seems to me that a great many of these Orange orators who were so loud-voiced about their Protestantism and about their loyalty had certainly a mistaken and a strange view of loyalty, and had allowed their so-called Protestantism and loyalty entirely to eclipse their Christianity. I have no word of abuse to utter of the rank and file of the Orange Party. Although I lived in Ulster for many years, I never uttered against them one word of abuse. I thought them misguided—greatly misguided—but I thought they were but creatures in the hands of others—of men who used them for selfish and personal ends. No words are too strong for those who fan the flame of religious rancour, and who divide, while they plunder, the farmers of Ulster. I speak of the landlords, or some at least of the landlords of Ulster, who have been grossly rack-renting their tenants; aye, their Orange tenants. In point of fact, Ulster is the most rack-rented Province in Ireland. But as far as Ulster is concerned, it appears to me that the case stands thus. The Orangemen are opposed to this Bill, and a considerable and powerful section of the Liberals are also opposed to the Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: All.] No; not all. A considerable and, as I believe, a growing number among the Protestant Liberals in Ulster are in favour of this measure. ["No!"] The hon. Member for the county of Down says "No;" but I say on the information I have received, "Yes;" and I say that this question of religious persecution is a bogey and a bugbear to affright the people of Ulster. In those subjects which concern the general good no class of Irishmen desires to draw a distinction based upon religion. I have before me an account of some of the opinions of leading Protestants in Ireland with reference to this Bill. I will only cite the opinion of Mr. Charles Eason, a gentleman who has for 30 years represented in Ireland the important commercial firm with which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Strand Division (Mr. W. H. Smith) is connected, and I think that opinion speaks volumes. Mr. Eason said—

"I have lived in Ireland for more than 30 years, and have had the control of a large and ever-increasing business with branches all over Ireland. I have never known an instance of Catholic intolerance towards me, nor towards the business which I have governed, nor does memory recall any cases of intolerance from Catholics coming under my knowledge at any time. I should not have the slightest fear to intrust my own liberties and those of my family to the control of an Irish Home Rule Parliament in connection with the Bill of Mr. Gladstone."

I cannot but regret that the noble Lord opposite could have lent the sanction of his name, and that my right hon. Friend the

Member for West Birmingham should have lent the sanction of his name, not merely to the expression of fears, but to the statement that the Ulster Protestants have good reason to fear what might happen if this Bill should pass. The Catholics of Ireland have not justified, as far as I know, any such statement. We are not going back, I hope, to the days of religious intolerance. It is true to say, to the discredit of all religions, that among their so-called professors there has been at one time or other of their histories the stain and the disgrace of persecution. What religion is there whose so-called professors are free from it? It is time that the hateful record was closed, and that we should judge men by the circumstances, not of the past, but of the present time. One word more with reference to Ulster and I have done with this branch of the subject. The fatal consequences which have followed upon our system of government in Ireland have in part caused, and in part accentuated, the division of classes and religious differences. The minority in Ireland generally had all the dignities and the powers of government in the country. You have taught them not to conform to Irish opinion, but to look to opinion beyond Ireland. Now, in every sound system of representative government the governors ought to be accountable to those whom they govern. In Ireland, however, it is not so. The governors care, as they have been taught to care, but little for Irish opinion; and this state of things has prevented that steady growth of local public opinion which, when it is wisely directed, is one of the most potent instruments in shaping the government of a people. We ought to endeavour to create an Irish public opinion, and to make it racy of the soil. I now desire to point out the wonderful parallel of Ireland with the case of Canada. There, as in the case of Ireland, a protest was made by a minority. In Canada there were really two nations speaking different languages; but ultimately a means was found of uniting them in one Legislative Assembly, and practically reconciling their differences. Then, as now, we had appeals which might be used to-day by the opponents of this Bill to save the minority of British settlers from the tyranny of the majority of French descent and professing the Catholic faith. History has shown how groundless were the fears then expressed. But I cannot dwell upon that subject. Then it is said that wealth and intellect are arrayed against this Bill. Well, wealth is a very good thing, and intellect is probably a better thing. But I do not admit that wealth and intellect are arrayed against this Bill. They may be, if the phrase is used, to signify that the aristocracy and the plutocracy are arrayed against it. Have they been very successful allies in the past? Wealth and intellect, I think it may truly be said, counselled Louis XVI. when he refused to make concessions and reforms which might have saved the French Monarchy and avoided the French Revolution. Certainly it could be said that wealth and intellect were the counsellors of George III. in his insane policy with reference to the American Colonies. Wealth and intellect certainly opposed, until the eve of a revolution, the granting of Catholic Emancipation. And it is hardly too much to say that, in the sense in which hon. Members opposite use these words, wealth and intellect have opposed all great concessions to the extension of popular rights. They have opposed the broadening and the laying down firmly of that enduring foundation upon which the great institutions of this country now securely rest. So much, Sir, for wealth, and so much for intelligence in the sense in which they are called upon to advocate opposition to this Bill. There may be in details objections to the Bill, no doubt; but was there ever any Bill on any such subject which might not be open to objection, particularly on a subject so difficult and so complex as this? I ask those who are favourable to the principle of the Bill to do the best they can to assist the Government in overcoming the objections. I ask nothing from hon. Gentlemen opposite. You say that we are advocating a policy of separation, and that we are Separatists. No, Sir; it is not true. We are advocating a policy which we believe will remove the cause which keeps two peoples asunder. You say we are anti-Unionists. No, Sir; it is not true. We seek to substitute for an unreal and a paper Union a Union founded upon mutual goodwill. You say we are the enemies of the interests of the Empire. Sir, in the view we take of the interests of the Empire, we are doing our best to conserve them. We believe that we belong to the Party that has done the most—we believe that we are led by the Minister who has done the most—to give a voice to the peoples of the Empire, and to make the blessings of that Empire the free inheritance of all its members. I ask the House to approach this question in a spirit of some trust in Irishmen. I ask it not to condemn the Irish people as a criminal nation, because of the faults of many individuals among them, faults which we deplore, but faults and crimes committed in times of great national pressure, almost of national revolution. We believe—I ask the House to believe—that there are in the Irish people solid qualities, solid virtues, which, given fair play, will assert themselves in the world. A former distinguished Member of this House—Chief Justice Whiteside—once, as I believe truly, said—

“The hand of Omnipotence, at whose touch that island started into existence, implanted in its people noble qualities of the intellect and the heart, and directed to the wise purposes for which Heaven designed them they will yet redeem, regenerate, and exalt their country.”

MR. WESTLAKE (Essex, Romford): We are constantly told that, on the second reading, we have only to consider the principle of this Bill, and not its details. I admit that character of a second reading vote; but I claim to find the principle which I am asked to affirm in the Bill itself, and not in any statement of any person, however eminent. Such statements are fleeting; they are apt to be forgotten after a short lapse of time; and they are sometimes made under the pressure of circumstances, and when that pressure departs they are shaped differently. That which remains, by which we shall be bound in history—for which, in fact, we vote—is the text of the Bill. And in seeking the principle in that text, I will not lose myself in the Serbounian bog of autonomy and independence, sovereignty, semi-sovereignty, and supremacy, for these are terms mostly drawn from International Law, a science of which the arguments are negotiations and the arbitrament the sword, and which is, therefore, of evil augury for the present debate. Nor are those terms very clear; because they have not been, and cannot have been, made definite by the decisions of Courts of Justice, like the terms of our own Municipal Law. I will ask the House to look at the state of things which the Bill proposes to create, and say, without reference to any such terms, whether it is a tolerable state? Now, I will not say the only principle, but that which strikes me as the most important, and which arrested my attention from the first, although, perhaps, it has not had so much attention given it as some other points of the measure, is the principle involved in the creation of an independent Irish Executive. The 7th section lays down that the Executive Government of Ireland is to continue vested in Her Majesty, and to be carried on by the Lord Lieutenant on behalf of Her Majesty, with the aid of such officers and such Council as to Her Majesty may from time to time seem fit. The plain English of this is, as was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in his great speech on introducing the Bill, that—

“The capital article of that (the Irish) Legislative Body will be that it should have the control of the Executive Government of Ireland, as well as of legislative business.”

It would even seem that this independent Irish Executive was the cardinal purpose which was sought in the provisions as to the Legislature; for, in moving the second reading of the Bill, the Prime Minister spoke of its being impossible

That being so, I ask the House to consider in what position this country will be placed, and in what position Ireland will be placed, if we consent to the establishment of an independent Irish Executive, to the principle that, in the ordinary course of law, the Executive authority in Ireland shall be entirely in Irish hands? I say, in the ordinary course of law, in order to exclude the contingency of the Act being repealed by the British Parliament, under that power which I agree with the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay) is not now reserved by the Bill, but which, we are told, may be added in Committee. For it is clear that that power of repeal, if it is to exist, will never be used until the dissatisfaction with the working of the Act has reached such a point as to place the two countries of England and Ireland at considerable variance; and its exercise would, therefore, practically amount to a reconquest of Ireland. Now, it will be of little use in this Bill to reserve any subjects for the exclusive legislation of the British Parliament, if no authority on this side of St. George's Channel is to have any authority for the purpose of giving adequate effect to such legislation, the carrying it into effect being entirely intrusted to the Irish Executive. It is idle to remind us that the Island will be garrisoned by our Military Forces, and perhaps, for a time, by our police. It is the daily administration of the law to which we must look. For example, there is the Department of Customs and Excise, which the Bill proposes to leave to the Imperial Parliament; and power is given to the Exchequer Judges to appoint their own officers to enforce their judgments, if they are not duly enforced by the Sheriff. This would apply to Revenue cases, and, I presume, would also include the enforcing of a judgment against the tenant who is to be turned into a landowner, for any instalment of principal and interest that may be due from him.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The intention is, that the authority given on behalf of the British Treasury—I am not now speaking of Customs and Excise, but of the land—shall never, on any occasion, be brought into contact with the Irish taxpayer, but simply with the Receiver of the Revenue in Ireland. The judgments of the Court of Exchequer will apply against those Receivers.

MR. WESTLAKE: In that case the security for the land loan will be less than I had thought. It still remains, with respect to the Customs and Excise, that the Exchequer Judges may appoint their own officers to enforce their judgments. But how are those officers to be supported? Clearly, they must rely for support on the Irish Executive. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] I know it is not so stated in the Bill; but there is nothing in the Bill to the contrary.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne): I would refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to Section 20, Subsection (4).

MR. WESTLAKE: That is the very provision I have been referring to, and

I ask how the officers appointed under it will be able to do what the Court orders them to do? Suppose a crowd assembles to resist the execution of a judgment, how is authority in such a case to be vindicated, except by a reference to the Irish Executive? It may be said that there are the troops; but, as has been pointed out by Sir Fitzjames Stephen in The Times on the 1st of May, 1886—

I will take another instance. It is well known that there have been occasions when the sentiments of the majority of the Irish people, with regard to foreign affairs, have been very different from those of the people of England and Scotland. It will be in the remembrance of many hon. Members that, at the time when this country was giving great encouragement to those Italians who were engaged in building up Italian unity, great offence was taken by a large portion of our Irish fellow-subjects, because it tended to the deprivation of the Pope's temporal sovereignty. Suppose a case occurred again in which, from whatever motive, a part of our foreign policy was strongly objected to by a large number of persons in Ireland. What power shall we have to enforce our Neutrality Laws in Ireland, if the Irish choose to infringe those laws for the purpose of giving assistance to any cause with which they may sympathize? Parliament will have power to make laws for preserving our neutrality; but it is the Irish Executive that will have to enforce them, and there may be enlistments in Ireland on behalf of some foreign cause which may be thoroughly unpopular in this country. In the ordinary course of law, no person and no body on this side of the St. George's Channel will be able to exercise authority in Ireland, and we shall be practically at the mercy of the Irish Executive, over which we shall have no sort of control. Now, I would ask hon. Members to consider, without reference to such words as sovereignty or supremacy, whether that would be a state of things which this country can put up with? It is not necessary, as my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has said that we seem to do, to attribute to the majority of the Irish people any extra dose of crime or folly. It is sufficient to refer to the differences which arise in affairs in the ordinary course of human nature. A close historical parallel to the condition which the Bill proposes to establish is to be found in the Confederation, or earlier Constitution, which was framed in 1781 by the United States. Among the defects which were proved by experience to exist in that Confederation, none appeared more important to the people of the United States than this defect—that the central power had no Executive authority, so that it could only recommend laws, not enforce them. It could recommend, but not act. The result was that the United States were rapidly falling into anarchy, to avoid which they adopted their present Constitution, which came into operation in 1789, and in which the central power possessed an Executive. This is what is said by that eminent authority, Chief Justice Story, in his work on The Constitution of the United States—

“The leading defects of the Confederation may be enumerated under the following heads. In the first place, there was an utter want of all coercive authority to carry into effect its own Constitutional measures. . . . There were no National Courts, having original or appellate jurisdiction over cases regarding the powers of the Union.”

This, I know, would not be quite so under the present Government scheme; but mark what follows—

“And if there had been, the relief would have been but of a very partial nature, since, without some Act of State legislation, many of those powers could not be brought into life. . . . The exercise of the power of appeal,” (in prize causes) “was resisted by the State Courts, notwithstanding its immense importance to the preservation of the rights of independent neutral nations. The Confederation gave, in express terms, this right of appeal. The decrees of the Courts of Appeal were equally resisted, and, in fact, they remained a dead letter until they were enforced by the Courts of the United States under the present Constitution. . . . There was in the Confederation no . . . authority to exercise force. . . . The consequence naturally was that the resolutions of Congress were disregarded, not only by States, but by individuals.”—(Sections 248, 249, 250, 252.)

It will be again observed that it is not necessary to impute to the Irish any particular ill-feeling towards England in order to apprehend similar consequences, and that the judgments of the Courts of Appeal, reserved by this Bill, will remain unexecuted. The Colonies, converted into States, had just been comrades in a successful war, and were filled with sentiments as fraternal as can ever be expected from countries not united under a common Executive. But the Government of the Confederation, says Chief Justice Marshall, in his Life of Washington—

“Depending on 13 distinct sovereignties. . . could only be rescued from ignominy and contempt by finding those sovereignties administered by men exempt from the passions incident to human nature.”—(Vol. 5, p. 31.)

The remedy was pointed to by Mr. Madison, afterwards President of the United States, in words which those will do well to lay to heart who comfort themselves by the thought that the British Parliament could repeal the Act we are now asked to pass, forgetting that the occasion for its doing so presupposes that Ireland at large had concurred in making that Act unworkable—

“To use force against a State is more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment, and would be considered by the party attacked a dissolution of all previous contracts. I therefore hope that a national system, with full power to deal directly with individuals, will be framed, and the resource be thus rendered unnecessary.”—(Quoted in Bancroft's History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States of America.—Vol. 2, p. 19.)

It was done as Madison hoped, and under their present Constitution the President of the United States has an Executive authority co-extensive with the Federal legislative power. So far as I am concerned, I have no difficulty in stating what is the principle on which I believe the House should deal with the Irish Question; and I am unable to perceive that my principle is in any way at variance with the statements either of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), or with those of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). The principle is, in fact, in the air, and I believe it is universally felt to be the one adopted by those who, without desiring to follow in the old ruts with regard to the government of Ireland, yet feel themselves unable to support the Bill now before the House. We must, at all hazards, maintain one supreme Executive Government for the United Kingdom. It is quite true that there is not one Executive Government for this country and the Colonies; but there is an essential difference between the position of the Colonies and that of Ireland. We have long made up our minds that if ever the Colonies should desire to separate from the Mother Country, though we should be very sorry to lose them, yet we should not make any effort to retain them by force. But the case of Ireland is different. Englishmen cannot make up their minds to submit with resignation to the separation of Ireland from the United Kingdom. On the contrary, I believe it is the determination of all Englishmen and Scotchmen to maintain the connection of Ireland with Great Britain. Therefore, it is necessary to maintain one supreme Executive and one supreme Legislature as the Constitutional basis of that Executive. But I hold that, while maintaining this, it is possible to give the Irish people an extended measure of self-government. However, even in any such measure of self-government, I have a strong objection to uniting East Ulster, forcibly and against its will, with the rest of Ireland. We are told that it is of no use to argue with the Irish about national sentiment, and prove to them that they ought not to feel foreign to us; that we must take sentiment as it is. And then the same persons, with great inconsistency, argue that East Ulster ought to be united in national sentiment with the rest of Ireland, and not with England and Scotland. It is true that you cannot argue a priori grounds as to different people being willing to act amicably together. "The wind bloweth where it listeth." There is not, as a fact, that unity of feeling between East Ulster and the rest of Ireland which would enable one National Government for the whole of Ireland to be successful. The example of Austria and Hungary has been quoted; but I am old enough to remember the struggle between those countries in 1848 and 1849, and those who took an interest in it, as I did, will remember that the greatest difficulty which Hungary had to contend with came from within and not from without. It was due to her claiming to hold Croatia within Hungarian bonds, refusing to Croatia that national recognition which the Hungarians claimed for themselves as against Austria—a case quite parallel to that of the Nationalist Party in Ireland refusing to East Ulster that separateness from them which they claim for themselves as against Great Britain. Then there is the Canadian precedent, so often cited, but without an accurate appreciation of its real point. After the Rebellion of 1837-8, responsible government was given to Canada in 1840, on the terms of uniting in one Legislature what was then known as Upper Canada, now the Province of Ontario, inhabited by English and Scotch Protestants, and what was then known as Lower Canada, now the Province of Quebec, inhabited by French and Irish Catholics. This experiment, to which the union of Eastern Ulster with the rest of Ireland in one Legislature without other partners would be precisely parallel, completely broke down; and its breakdown was one of the main arguments used in the Canadian Legislature in favour of again separating the Upper and Lower Provinces, and only uniting them in the Dominion, together with the other British North American Colonies. Mr. (now Sir) John A. Macdonald, moving, on behalf of the Government, the Address to the Crown for federation in the Legislative Assembly of Canada on the 6th of February, 1865, after mentioning "the opposition between the two sections of the Province," said—

"None are more impressed by this momentous state of affairs, and the grave apprehensions that exist of a state of anarchy destroying our credit, destroying our prosperity, destroying our progress, than are the Members of this present House; and the leading statesmen on both sides seem to have come to the common conclusion that some step must be taken to relieve the country from the deadlock and impending anarchy that hang over us."

And Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, moving the similar Address on behalf of the Government in the Legislative Council on the 3rd of February, 1865, said—

"But there are other motives and other reasons which should induce us to agree to this scheme. Every hon. Gentleman in the House knows the political position of the country, and is acquainted with the feelings of irritation which have prevailed for many years. We know it, happily not by our experience in this House, but by the tone of the public Press, and by the discussions in "another place," where taunts and menaces are freely flung across the floor by contending parties. We know what human passions are, and how, when bitter feelings continue for a long time, the distance between exasperation and actual conflict is not very great."

That those were not idle exaggerations is proved by the fact that the Parliament House at Montreal had been burnt in a formidable riot arising out of the feeling between the jealous sections of the population compulsorily united in 1840. It was the federation of the North American Colonies in the Dominion, and not the mere giving of responsible government to Canada, which proved a success. We have, in this House, taunts and menaces freely flung across the Gangway, like those to which Sir Etienne Taché referred; and the true lesson to be learnt from the Canadian example is that, where such difficulties exist, you will not cure them by attempting to force a common responsibility on those who do not possess in common the moral and social conditions for bearing that responsibility worthily. There is yet another condition to be made with regard to that self-government which may be granted to Ireland, subject to the unity of the supreme Executive and Legislature. We must not shift on other shoulders burdens which, by the terms of our own measures, we admit that they are not to be fully trusted to bear. An heroic measure with regard to the Land Question is in contemplation to follow the Home Rule Bill; but the Irish land difficulty has been, in great measure, created by the misgovernment of our forefathers, and it is our duty to solve the question ourselves, and not shirk our responsibilities. I would now ask the Irish Nationalist Members why they should object to continued union with Great Britain, on the principles which I have laid down? They themselves admit that they do not desire complete separation, and nature, which has placed Ireland in such close proximity to Britain, forbids it. But such a Constitution as this Bill proposes could only lead to separation or reconquest. Why, then, should they not be content with that which the geographical conditions admit, and continue to share, in such a Union with Great Britain as I have indicated, the prosperity, the power, and the glory of this great Empire, in which Englishmen and Scotchmen are glad to recognize them as partners? It has been truly said in the course of the debate that Irishmen have largely helped to make the British Empire, and are now largely helping to govern it in every quarter of the world. We have also heard that millions of the sons of Ireland, unable to find employment in their own country, are crowding the workshops of England. Then I would ask why Irishmen should not be as proud of their helping to maintain the industrial greatness of the Empire as of sharing in its victories and its glories? Why can they not feel that Manchester and Birmingham are as much theirs as Trafalgar and Waterloo? But Irishmen may claim even more than that. If they will be content to remain in the Legislative Union, with a large measure of self-government subject to it, they may claim the glory of having contributed to the completion and perfection of that very system of local self-government of which England is peculiarly proud, by carrying it on to a larger measure of development, which we should never have thought of but for them. These appear to me to be the true Liberal principles, and in advocating them I cannot admit that I am separating myself in any respect from the traditional policy of the Liberal Party. The principles of the Liberal Party are not of yesterday—they were the same a year ago as to-day—but a year ago it was foreseen that the Irish representation in the House of Commons would be as it is now. Lord Spencer had foretold, within one man, the number of Nationalists who would be returned; and if such a result was to lead on Liberal principles to the measure now before the House, I submit that it was the duty of the Leaders of the Party to place that view of the matter before the country, while there was time for the country to express an opinion on it. But that was not done. The result is that the Liberal Party has been divided in a manner which I hope is only temporary, but which is, nevertheless, to be very much regretted. I admit that the Liberal Associations throughout the country have, to a large extent, thrown their weight and influence on one side of the controversy, and I have done much to assist in the establishment of Liberal Associations, and recognize their right to speak. But on this occasion the view which impresses itself on me most strongly, and which I should wish to impress on them, is that they and we are but two links in one great chain of representation. For all ordinary purposes the Association may be the organ between the Member and the constituency which he represents; but the Association represents the Party, and the Party represents to the nation one of the great principles on the conservation and just balance of which its national life depends. Nor does the chain end here. For even the whole existing generation represents a national life which has been handed down to us by our ancestors, and which it is our duty to hand down unimpaired to the generations yet to come.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said, he gave his cordial support to the Bill, which he regarded as a generous recognition of the demand of the Irish people for self-government. He did not propose to follow the line of argument indulged in during the course of this most important debate, or to examine all the fallacies brought forward, and trotted out ad nauseam. All he wished to draw attention to was a few salient features of the case, and a few strong arguments were brought forward as part of the just case for local self-government. They—the Irish—looked on it as a happy augury that, for the first time since the Act of Union was passed, the Irish demand for National autonomy was likely to receive a favourable hearing in that House, for they recognized the fact that the Irish Representatives, for the first time, were face to face with the Representatives of the English democracy. They possessed their soul in patience at this crisis of their country's history, for they had every confidence that this new element in the British Constitution was disposed to give full consideration to the demand for Irish self-government. The Irish demand for self-government would not depend on one set of circumstances—on a few instances that might be crowded into the history of the last few years. They rested their claim to National autonomy upon the historical right of the Irish people, and also on grounds of expediency. They said that the Act of Union was brought about by fraud and corruption of the most abominable character, and had failed to fulfil, even in one respect, the hopes and the intentions of those English statesmen who had brought about the measure of 85 years ago. The claim of the Irish people to a separate Parliament of their own went back very early into English and into Irish history. The claim to an Irish Parliament dated from the Reign of King

John. It was certainly not then a Parliament of the Irish people. Nothing of the kind. Instead of a Parliament of the Irish people, what was then established was a Parliament of the English Pale. But in the times of James I. there was an Irish Parliament representative of the people; for the student who would turn over the pages of history would find Ireland divided into shires and boroughs, and Representatives sent from each to that Parliament in the Reign of James I. It would weary the House, and would not tend much to further the arguments of the Irish Party, if he delayed the House by historical references. He would go no further than to say that even although the Act 6 Geo. I. abrogated the rights of the Irish Parliament in making it dependent on that of Great Britain, yet the Irish nation never acquiesced in that Act, and continual remonstrances year after year went up from the Irish Parliament against that Act of 6 Geo. I. Indeed, that Act implied that the Irish people had a right to their own Parliament, for it acknowledged that there was pre-existent right in the Irish people to representation. The Parliament of 1782 could not possibly have succeeded in fulfilling its mission in legislating for Ireland—could not fulfil the functions of a legislative and deliberative Assembly—simply because of the adverse influence of the Castle. All the executive authority was in the hands of a British Minister; the Irish Parliament was thwarted at every step, and the dreadful scenes of 1798 came upon the unfortunate country, because the Castle stood in the way, blocking every effort of the Irish Parliament, destroying its authority as a Legislative Assembly, and bringing things to such a desperate condition that Mr. Pitt was forced to consider some way of ending the turmoil, trouble, and bloodshed, and brought about the Union. He commended to the attention of hon. Gentlemen who desired to look into this question the words used by Mr. Fox in Committee of the Whole House on the Address from the Irish Parliament—

“It is not my intention to pursue the footsteps of my Predecessors, and therefore I will agree to the demands of the Irish relative to the repeal of 6 Geo. I., not because I am intimidated and afraid to oppose those demands, but because I believe them to be founded in justice. The man must be a shallow politician indeed who could not find means of distressing

[Sixth Night.]

Ireland and making her keep the weight of calamity. The resources of the country are amply sufficient for the purpose of devastation, but he must be a shallow politician who must resort to such means to enforce obedience to laws which were opposed by those whom they were meant to bind."

Later on in the same speech Mr. Fox said—

"Notwithstanding that this country is parting with what she has held and exercised, still I cannot look upon this as a day of humiliation to her. She is giving up what it is just she should give up, and in doing so is offering a sacrifice to justice. Policy and justice combine to induce her to offer it. I should be sorry an idea should prevail that she is giving to fear that which she would deny to justice. I entertain no doubts on this respecting Ireland, and I have no doubt she will be satisfied by the manner in which England is about to comply with her demand, and that in affection, as well as in interest, they will be but one people, England renouncing all claim to legislate for Ireland, and cordially supporting her as a friend whom she loved. If, on the contrary, this country must pursue a course of making laws for Ireland, she will make an enemy, for where there is no unity of interest, and no mutual regard for those interests, there the party whose interests are sacrificed becomes an enemy."

Undoubtedly there were many points of friction between the British Parliament and Grattan's Parliament; but hon. Members would do well to notice that by this Bill every one of those points had been removed from the cognizance of the proposed Irish Legislature. It was impossible that Grattan's Parliament could have done its work. He had already explained the reason. It was further explained by the language of Mr. Fox, which he would quote, as it had some bearing upon affairs at present. Mr. Fox said regarding the recall of Earl Fitzwilliam—

"The conduct of Earl Fitzwilliam was certainly very dangerous, but to whom was it dangerous—to the people of Ireland? By no means. It was dangerous only to the few individuals whose plan it was to govern Ireland by corruption. It was dangerous to those who held the interests and the sentiments of the people of the country in contempt. The noble Lord is, I believe, the only person who had the good fortune to obtain the praise of all the Catholics and Dissenters in Ireland—the only person who, since the accession of the House of Brunswick, had been able to unite all parties in the Kingdom. To please every man was impossible, but Earl Fitzwilliam had pleased the House of Lords of Ireland and the House of Commons, who has granted during his administration supplies that were unparalleled in extent. He had pleased the Catholics of Ireland and the Protestants of Ireland—the noble Earl had, in short, pleased the masses of the people in Ireland, but he had displeased Mr. Beresford and two or three more.

Mr. Flynn

Thus, when the people of Ireland were put into one scale and Mr. Beresford and a few more individuals into the other, the people with all their weight flew up, and Mr. Beresford and a few other individuals predominated."

It had been asserted that Ireland had prospered since the Union. He supposed one of the first fruits of prosperity would be an increase of population. At the Union the population of Ireland was over 5,000,000, or one-third of the entire population of the United Kingdom. In 1821 it was less than one-third. Twenty years afterwards it was still somewhat below one-third. In 1861 it was one-fifth, and in 1881 it had fallen to one-seventh. Upon the fate of this measure possibly depended whether Ireland should obtain a fairly numerous and prosperous population. The best ability of Ireland had been leaving the country since the Union. Demands for the restoration of the Irish Parliament had been unceasing. Ten years after the accomplishment of the Union the Dublin Corporation, which was entirely Protestant, unanimously passed a resolution demanding repeal of the Union, which it declared to be detrimental to the best interests of Ireland, and laid special stress upon the fact that the material interests of the country were suffering. In the same year the freemen and freeholders of Dublin, also Protestants, in mass meeting assembled, passed a similar resolution. The demands for autonomy had been continuous from the Union down to the present time. Mr. Butt proposed Home Rule on the lines of federation; but he was met with the objection that England could not be expected to change her institutions for the sake of Ireland. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) on that occasion voted against the Motion. But now, when a scheme was submitted which was free from the objections made to Mr. Butt's proposals, the right hon. Member for West Birmingham proposed to adopt as an alternative those very lines of federation which the House scouted 12 years ago. He found it hard to account for that inconsistency. The House must be pretty well tired of the objection regarding Ulster. He assured the House, however, though a Nationalist and the Representative of a Roman Catholic constituency, that if he believed any measure of Home Rule for Ireland contained a single provision that would militate against the religious or civil interests of any section of his fellow-countrymen he would not support it. But he regretted to hear the bitter old religious cry raised in an enlightened House of Commons towards the end of the 19th century in order to prejudice the chances of the passing of that Bill. The right hon. Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen) had laid great stress in his opposition to the measure on the case of Ulster; but he wanted to know what Ulster the right hon. Gentleman meant? If that Bill became law and a separate Legislature was demanded for Ulster, he asked whether it was demanded for the five counties of that Province which, according to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), were predominantly Nationalist, or for the four which were predominantly Loyalist? Moreover, many of the Protestants in Ulster were Dissenters, who were strongly in favour of that Bill, and they were now coming to the front. The right hon. Member for East Edinburgh had spoken of Ulster as being exceptionally prosperous and wealthy. That might be so, but it did not make Irishmen content to see the rest of their country remain in poverty of an ever-deepening character; and when the exceptional prosperity of Ulster was dwelt upon, it should be remembered that Ulster had long enjoyed exceptional advantages over the rest of the Island from two important circumstances—first, that ever since the Plantation under King James I., tenant right had prevailed there; and, secondly, that the linen trade of Ulster had been nurtured and fostered by English legislation, while the woollen manufacture and other industries in other parts of Ireland had been systematically depressed and discouraged. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh said that Ulster contributed 45 per cent of the Income Tax of Ireland. But he should like to know why the right hon. Gentleman gave the Income Tax under Schedule D only? To his (Mr. Flynn's) mind, it was a part and parcel of the conspiracy of suppression, and the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman was unworthy of a man of his standing in the financial world. He held in his hand a Return which was brought forward in the year 1882. That Return showed that the Income Tax assessment for Ulster was £9,950,000, and for Leinster £13,270,000. This latter Province had a population of 400,000 less than Ulster. The population of Munster, a "poor and degraded Province," was 400,000 less than Ulster, and yet the Income Tax assessment amounted to £7,980,000. The Income Tax assessment for the whole of Ireland was £34,200,000, out of which £9,950,000 represented the Income Tax assessment of Ulster. Taking it from the point of view of population, the assessment was £10 6s. 9d. per head in Leinster, £6 in Munster, and £5 14s. in Ulster. Those figures, he thought, proved that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh went for nothing. Another Return, which had upon it the name of the right hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), and was dated May 18, 1884, showed that the value of rateable property in all Ireland was £13,856,000. In Leinster it was £4,711,000, in Ulster £4,348,000, and in the "poor" Province of Munster £3,500,000. When right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who had been connected with Departments of the Legislature brought forward cooked statistics for obvious purposes he thought he was quite justified in quoting those figures. He had striven to show that Ulster had enjoyed an exceptional prosperity as compared with the rest of Ireland, and that it had been the direct result of legislation in that House. They rejoiced that that was so; but it was a great hardship that that fact should be brought against the argument for the second reading of a Bill which he hoped would bring prosperity to the whole of Ireland. One of the arguments that had been frequently used against the passing of this measure was, that if it became law it would be merely used by Irish Members as a stepping-stone for obtaining other measures, and ultimately to procure complete separation. Were those arguments used merely for controversial purposes, or were they used with any amount of honesty by the Members who employed them? There was one class whom it was utterly hopeless to try to convince, and there was another class who had used those arguments with malice aforethought.

Mr. SPEAKER, interposing, said, that the hon. Gentleman was not entitled to apply the words malice aforethought to any hon. Gentleman in that House, and must withdraw them.

MR. FLYNN said that, of course, he would withdraw them; but he did not apply the words to any particular hon. Member, but to a body of Gentlemen.

MR. SPEAKER said, that he must not accuse any body of Members of doing anything with malice aforethought.

MR. FLYNN said, he would withdraw the expression with pleasure. He would only add, in conclusion, that the argument about finality had been used by those who had systematically denied the smallest concession to Irish demands. He asked hon. Members to note the change of tone and temper which the Bill had produced amongst the Irish race. That was an evidence that if the Bill should pass through Committee containing the principle of autonomy which the Irish Members now recognized in it. The Irish people would give every pledge that was necessary for them to give that it would not be looked upon as a stepping-stone to separation, but as a fair settlement of the case. No Englishman could desire to see the present relations which existed between the two countries continued permanently. The Irish people were willing to loyally abide by the conditions contained in the Bill, which would result in a union between the two countries which would be more enduring than could be secured by anything written upon parchment, or contained within the four corners of an Act of Parliament.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) said, he thought he might be permitted, as the first Member who had spoken in favour of the Bill since they had listened to the Attorney General, to entirely deny the charge, so far as he himself was concerned, that had been repeatedly stated on both sides of the House, and again repeated by the noble Lord that evening (Viscount Lympington), that those who felt disposed to support the measure were blindly led by the genius, the ability, and the vast successes of the Prime Minister. He would tell the House briefly why he was influenced in the support he had given the Bill. First of all, long before he had a seat in that House, or, indeed, before he had the remotest idea that he ever should obtain a seat there, he was disposed to look on himself as a believer in what was known as Home Rule. He was willing to admit that he found great differences existing as to what was really meant by that term; but in order that no misunderstanding should arise at any time between himself and those whom he sought to represent in that House, he stated in his address in November last that, short of actual separation, he was anxious that Ireland should receive the fullest measure of self-government. Believing, as he did, that by the provisions of this Bill the way to separation was most effectually barred, while they would afford the largest measure of self-government to Ireland, he should give the second reading of the measure his most cordial sympathy and support. Another reason which had induced him to support the second reading of the Bill—and let him tell hon. Members that it was a consideration to which he attached considerable importance—it was this—that he had every reason to believe that in doing so he should be fulfilling the honest desire of his constituents. Apart from his declarations before the Election—sufficiently expressive in themselves to justify any support he might give to such a proposal as this—he felt himself doubly bound to do so from the resolutions which had reached him as the result of meetings of many of his constituents. Of all the great questions which had come before them in recent years it was remarkable that at all those meetings, which were attended by several thousands of electors, not one present raised his voice against those measures when the vote was taken. Since that time public meetings continued to be held, and resolutions continued to reach him in favour of the Government, and asking that he should give these proposals his fullest sympathy and support. Thus, either as a matter of personal conviction, or from an honest desire to reflect by his voting and speech the opinions of those whom he had the honour to represent, he felt he was most fully exonerated from the charge that had been so repeatedly put forward by hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House. He was at a loss to understand the attitude which had been taken up by hon. Members sitting on that side of the House above the Gangway who opposed the Bill. They had been told a short time ago by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale that the measure had been sprung upon the country without proper warning and without due time for consideration. He observed, when the declaration was made, that hon. Gentlemen who had assumed an attitude of hostility to the Bill throughout the debate cheered the utterances of the noble Lord—as much as to say that because they found themselves in Parliament without a mandate from their constituents that was sufficient to justify their opposition to the measure. Well, he was free to say that if a division had taken place upon the first reading of the Bill those hon. Members might have been fully justified in making such a remark; but what had occurred since? He found that many of the constituencies, taking the hint thrown out to them by the noble Lord, and by the significant cheer given by hon. Members above the Gangway, put themselves to considerable trouble by means of conferences, of public meetings, and of open air demonstrations, to give their Representatives a mandate on the question. Notwithstanding that they had been put in possession of such a mandate they still maintained an attitude of hostility to the measure. They refused to be considered as delegates; but they failed to see that in the attitude they had taken up they were not Representatives. There had been much discussion, which, in his humble opinion, was more applicable to the Committee stage of the Bill than to the second reading. The time of the House had been taken up with lawyer-like criticism of details rather than statesmanlike examination of principles. He freely admitted that he was not sufficiently versed in the technicalities of law to warrant him in setting up his opinion on matters of detail against the opinions of hon. and learned Gentlemen who had preceded him. He would reserve his judgment on matters of detail for the time when the Bill went into Committee. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] He quite understood the significance of that cheer. It meant that in all probability the Bill would never see the Committee stage. He entertained no such opinion, nor had he ever done so. He preferred to hold with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), whom he was sorry not to see in his place—he was now quoting from a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman at Swansea in 1883—that “though English Radicals may occasionally be unreasonable, they are never irreconcilable.” And he could assure hon. Gentlemen who had derisively cheered him, when he referred to the Committee stage of the Bill, that though he and some of his Friends considered some English Radicals unreasonable, they did not regard them as irreconcilable, and he hoped with their assistance that they would carry the second reading of the Bill. The noble eulogy which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham made on the character and enterprise of the people of Ulster left nothing to be said which it was desirable to say by way of compliment to them; but he could not help wondering, when the right hon. Gentleman put forth his claim for the exemption of Ulster from the provisions of the Bill, how he proposed to reconcile the terms of that speech in relation to the minority in Ireland with the terms employed by him in another speech in reference to minorities not merely in Ireland, but in England and Scotland as well. He had a distinct remembrance of a speech which the right hon. Gentleman delivered in November, 1883, a great portion of which was taken up in denouncing what the right hon. Gentleman considered a “fad” of the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) and of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tyneside Division of Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey) with reference to proportional representation. He had the curiosity to turn to that speech, and under the head of “Downtrodden majorities” he found these words—he was quoting from the authorized version—

“What we have to deal with, the evil against which we are protesting, is the inordinate influence and power which minorities have obtained in our system of representation. It is time that someone should stand up and say a word for the downtrodden majority. I believe that what these Gentlemen are trying to solve is a problem for which no solution can possibly be found. When men differ either the majority must give way to the minority, or the minority must give way to the majority. There is no other way out of the difficulty, and if there is any hardship in the surrender, surely it is much less when the operation is performed by the less numerous party.”

But the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied with that. He told them most emphatically that all the minority had a right to ask for was that they should have a fair opportunity for the discussion of their views, and a fair field and no favour in the attempt to convert the majority. He was disposed to regard that as sound doctrine. He was not aware that anyone in or out of the House desired anything else than that Ulster should have the fullest opportunity for the discussion of her opinions and for the ventilation of her ideas, and it was certain that by the provisions of the Bill fair play would be guaranteed to the people of Ulster. A great deal had been said about alternative schemes; but nothing had so startled the House as the alternative proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. A. W. Hall), who said that the alternative of this scheme was one of civil war in Ireland and war with the United States of America. He could only hope that hon. Members would choose the scheme of the Prime Minister before such alternatives. The present measure, as he understood it, was intended by the Government as a message of peace to Ireland. In that sense he believed it was hailed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. In that spirit he believed it to be welcomed by the great majority of Irishmen in Ireland, in England, and in the United States of America. That was a prospect created by the introduction of this measure which he hailed with delight—a prospect which promised fair to bind the hearts of the people of Ireland with the people of Great Britain in a real, happy, and indissoluble union. And he trusted that hon. Members would consider well the responsibility they were taking upon themselves before they were led into the opposite Lobby, and by their vote, it might be, throw out the measure. If he might give a word of advice to the Government, it was “Stand firm to the position which you have taken up, whether your policy be denounced by hon. Gentlemen opposite, or whether it be shunned by some hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, for it has the sympathy of, and it will ultimately receive emphatic endorsement by, the great and growing democracy of this country.”

MR. TREVELYAN (Hawick, &c.): Sir, I consider myself particularly fortunate that you have selected me to follow a much respected and esteemed county Member. My hon. Friend has strong opinions on the subject of constituents; but now he shall hear what one, at any rate, of his constituents thinks about him. I can assure him that however much he may differ from me in opinion yet even in these times I shall always be glad to go by the name of his constituent. But he must forgive me for saying that I cannot accept altogether his views as to the duty of a Representative. He says that since the last General Election a great many constituencies have provided their Members with a mandate. I should just like to know what he and those who, in the excitement of the moment and charmed by his native eloquence, cheered him—what these hon. Gentlemen would wish a Member of Parliament to do, who, having strong opinions against a measure, gets a mandate from his constituents to support it? [“Resign!”] Does he seriously think that the mandate ought to make any difference in the views which the hon. Member takes of that particular question? Hon. Members opposite say “Resign;” but, Sir, are we to resign on every occasion when we differ from our constituents? When we ought to resign is when a General Election is held, and some great public question is before the electorate. Then if a Member changes the views he held at the time he was elected—then I say that a Member who finds himself occupying such a position ought justly to feel himself called upon to resign. But that is not the case here. Nothing could be more decided than the views which I expressed to my constituents on this very question, and nothing could be more enthusiastic and apparently more unanimous than the manner in which they received those views at the time of the General Election. I do not blame them, or any of them, if they have changed their views. If they have changed their views, and now hold different opinions, then at the next General Election they will turn me out. I should then cease to be their Member; but if whenever I receive any new mandate I was to hold different views to what I had previously held, they would justly consider me unworthy to be their Representative, and I should think so myself. Likewise, Sir, I think myself very fortunate in having the opportunity of following so closely my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. It was, indeed, a great pleasure to listen to him, for he surpassed himself, which is no easy task. The pleasure of listening to him was, however, in many cases, somewhat dashed, because I felt myself bound to follow him. I find that it is now or never with me, and that he has me at a terrible disadvantage. First of all, he is an Irishman, descanting in eloquent terms upon his countrymen, while I am an Englishman. I am willing to attribute to Irishmen all those high qualities which they do possess—I can attribute to them those superhuman qualities which would enable them to work side by side with us Englishmen under the scheme of this Bill, and which I believe no nation with any national character at all would be able to work under. [Interruption.] I trust that hon. Members who interrupt will bear in mind the manner in which the speech of my hon. and learned Friend was listened to, and will imitate the courtesy which was shown to him. My hon. and learned Friend has another advantage, in that he is a Member of the Government, which is responsible for the safety of the Empire and of Ireland, and which is pronouncing the new depositories of power to be worthy of the power which they are going to confer, while I, as only an individual speaking against the Government, and doubting whether the new depositories are in all respects worthy of the power, am at a great disadvantage. But in one respect we are on equal terms. He is a consistent Home Ruler, who has never said or thought anything in the least contrary to what he has said from the Treasury Bench to-night, while I, on the other hand, although admitting that the action of the Prime Minister makes it necessary to give more—and much more—than was thought wise and safe six months ago, am bound to say that in all essential respects what I said 12 months ago or two years ago from the Treasury Bench are words which appear to me to have been well founded, and are words to which I keep at the present day. Necessarily I had a great disadvantage to contend against, and my hon. and learned Friend has made great use of it. He had a full opportunity of stating what we who oppose this measure are precluded—and rightly precluded—from stating. He is a supporter of the Bill, and he can classify us as he likes. My hon. and learned Friend made out four classes of us, in the first of which he placed me, and he said that he was unable to understand why I was likely to vote against this measure. Sir, I answer that the reason why I cannot vote for this measure is that I have certain grave objections which have been stated in the course of this debate, and which have never been answered from the Treasury Bench. These objections were stated with very great force by a Scotch Member, whose speech made all of us Scotch Members very proud—the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay), and likewise in the careful, argumentative, and thoughtful speech of the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone). They were answered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department in a speech about Mr. Pitt and the motives of Grattan's Parliament in the last century; but that speech did not contain one word giving to his hearers the least idea that that very evening there had been made two great speeches containing reasons drawn from the experience of this century, which had to be answered before any of us could vote for this Bill. Those are the reasons which influenced the opponents of the Bill, and instead of having those reasons answered we are told that we must vote for this measure, if we are in favour of autonomy for Ireland, without being told what the autonomy is to be. That I think was the gist of the speech of my right hon. Friend, although his eloquence was such that we perhaps, at times, lost sight of it. We were told that all those who are in favour of granting, under proper safeguards, a Legislative Assembly to Ireland should vote for the second reading of this Bill. That contention was urged still more definitely by an important private Member, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who in his speech said—

“The principle is clear and distinct; it is that of autonomy for Ireland; that Ireland should have the right to legislate for itself, and administer its own separate affairs, but that Imperial matters and common affairs should be reserved for the Imperial Parliament, and should not be dealt with by the Local Legislature. Everything beyond that remains open, I understand. Whether the Irish Members shall continue to sit in this House as now, whether they shall sit on Imperial questions, whether Ulster shall be treated exceptionally in any way, or what the constitution of the new Irish Legislature shall be, are important points for future consideration; but they are subordinate questions for the moment, and may be postponed with advantage. But until the main principle is settled nothing can be done."—(8 Hansard, [215] 132.)

That is exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) said when he told us that we were turning the debate on the second reading into a debate in Committee. There might have been some justice in that criticism when the first reading only of the Bill was before the House, and it might have been said, with some force, that the debate was turned into one in Committee; but it has been attempted to make the debate upon the second reading a debate upon a mere abstract Resolution. That was not the intention of the Prime Minister when this Bill was first introduced. The Prime Minister on that occasion used these words—

"What I wish is that we should no longer fence and skirmish with this question, but that we should come to close quarters with it; that we should get, if we can, at the root; that we should take measures not merely intended for the wants of to-day and of to-morrow, but, if possible, that we should look into a more distant future; that we should endeavour to anticipate and realize that future by the force of reflection."

That is exactly what I shall address myself to. I quite allow that this Bill may meet present wants. What are the wants of to-day? They are, in the first place, to avoid the necessity of having recourse to coercion and to occupy Irish Members with Irish legislation; and, as we are told in a hundred speeches, to give us time to carry out Scotch and English legislation. Undoubtedly, the Bill may fulfil those wants; but there are many grave questions as to the future which must be answered before many of us can with satisfaction vote for this Bill. First of all comes the financial difficulty. What will be the relative positions of Great Britain and Ireland financially, looked at from a practical point of view? The gross Revenue of Ireland will be £8,350,000. From this we must deduct £830,000 a-year for the expenses of collection, leaving a net Revenue of £7,500,000. Out of this every year will be paid into the British Treasury £4,600,000—that is to say, out of a Revenue of £7,500,000 Ireland is making a bargain by which she will pay £4,500,000 into the Treasury, whose relations to Ireland I will describe in a word later on. That is the Revenue of Ireland, and that is the contribution she will make; is it heavier than she can bear? Now, we want the opinion of British authorities on this point just now, because it is British authority that is required to make the bargain; but it is the Irish authorities who will have to keep it; and what is the opinion of the Irish authorities? We have had a debate this year, when the hon. Member for Monaghan (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), who opened the debate, told us that between 1851 and 1871—

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in quoting words used in a debate in the House during the present Session?

Mr. SPEAKER: It would not be in Order for the right hon. Gentleman to refer to a past debate in this Session which was not upon the present Bill.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I bow at once, Sir, to your ruling.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: The speech referred to was not mine.

Mr. TREVELYAN: Then I will refer generally to the debate, and say that hon. Members opposite objected to the fact that Ireland was very much over-taxed, and that she had to pay £2,300,000 a-year into the British Exchequer. Now, instead of paying £2,300,000 a-year into the English Exchequer, she will henceforward have to pay £4,600,000 a-year into an Exchequer which will be a great deal more an English Exchequer than ever. Hon. Members have complained on frequent occasions in this House that the local rates of Ireland are so high that the people can not only not pay the rates, but cannot even pay the taxes. The hon. Members who make these complaints are loyal followers of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and I have no doubt that when the time comes they will vote for this Bill. They will accept the bargain which has been offered to them; but some of those hon. Members are very young men indeed—men whose age many of us who have been returned from the Sister Island envy exceedingly, seeing them so early in political life; and the day may come when these Members will be Irish Ministers; and it will be difficult to blame them if, some 30 years hence, they should do their best to get rid of a payment to the British Exchequer that they considered to be monstrous and extortionate because a long while ago, in a great national crisis, they were silent parties, perhaps, to accepting that bargain. When we consider what loud complaints are made in this Parliament, in which five-sixths of the Members are English and Scotch, on the manner in which Ireland is over-taxed and over-mulcted, just imagine what will be the effect of these complaints when addressed to a purely Irish Parliament; just imagine what will be the case a good many years hence when Ireland is told that her taxation is kept up to a point which is tyrannical and oppressive in order that two-thirds of her entire Revenue should be handed over to a Treasury across the Channel. Again, it is not only in Ireland that this is felt; but the same feelings are entertained by Irishmen on the other side of the Atlantic. I read, and I have for a long time past read, The Irish World.

MR. T. M. HEALY: For what purpose? You did not allow other people to read it.

MR. TREVELYAN: I hope the hon. and learned Member will allow me to finish my sentence. I have read it, not for the sake of picking out the bitter things said against England, but for the purpose of reading principally the different speeches which have been made by Irish-Americans, in order that I might really know what the Irish-American opinion was.

MR. T. M. HEALY: You would not let that paper go into Ireland.

MR. TREVELYAN: I see, in the last number of The Irish World, that at a meeting at Pittsburg, attended by 10,000 people, the principal orator, General Megley, said—

"At this moment there are 900,000 men, women, and children in destitution in Ireland. Although England is by far the richest country, her people pay the least tax. Ireland is the poorest and the weakest, and she is most heavily taxed."

And yet this Bill does not diminish the taxation of Ireland by a single half-penny, but stereotypes it at the point at which it stands at present. Now, it is quite impossible for anyone who has been Irish Secretary not to see that there has been an opinion very widely held in Ireland that Home Rule will lead to the development of the resources of the country. It is plain that that development cannot come from what hon. Members have favoured from time to time—namely, differential duties, because that is impossible under the conditions of this scheme. It can only come from loans, grants, possibly from bounties, and especially, and above all, from public works which the new Government may propose to execute. But all this requires money; and where is the money to come from? If Ireland is taxed and rated up to the very last point, either the people who expect to have the resources of Ireland developed by the new Government will be terribly disappointed, or else the new Government will have to borrow money at an extravagant rate of interest, which they will be quite unable to pay when we have taken such a large slice out of the surplus. It is said that the Irish Members are the best judges of the bargain they are to make for Ireland. That is very true; and my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General says that the great evil in dealing with Ireland has been that we have not thought of what their Representatives hold, but only of what the English and Scotch Representatives hold. But I maintain that this is an English and Scotch question as well as an Irish question, and that it will be a very great disadvantage for England and Scotland financially, and in much more serious ways, if Ireland has a great financial grievance of this nature. The Prime Minister expresses my opinion on this matter with very great force, as he always does. He says—

"To place the State and the Treasury of this country in the position of creditorship is like placing a bastard premium on every attempt to disturb the relations between England and Ireland."—3 Hansard, [280] 453-4.)

That speech of the Prime Minister was made not with regard to this Bill, but it was made with regard to the Land Bill. It was made in 1893 about the land scheme of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). But if it is a bastard premium on ill-feeling between this country and Ireland to place the State and the Treasury of Great Britain in that position of creditorship, how much more is the premium if you place the State and

the Treasury in such a position, and in such a grinding and an exacting position with regard to the whole collective taxpayers of the United Kingdom? Then we come to the question of what the relation between the two Governments is. We have had from the Treasury Bench every possible parallel as to the future relations between Ireland and this country; but I think not one of them justifies us in thinking that things will run smoothly between the Treasuries of the two countries. The Prime Minister, in a remarkable passage, referred to the remarks of Sir Gavan Duffy about Canada. Canada has been a favourite subject of comparison, and was descanted upon last by the Attorney General. But if we are to compare the future relations of Ireland to England with Canada, we must compare them all round. What would be our relations with Canada if, out of £6,000,000 of Revenue, Canada had to pay £4,000,000 a-year to the British Treasury? My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary spoke of Victoria. Well, I suppose that the leading Colonies of Australia have, by means partly of their land sales, about the same Revenues as Ireland; but I should like to know what would be the feeling of those Colonies towards us if they had to pay us £4,000,000 a-year? But we need not draw on our imagination as to the difficulty of exacting money from the Colonies. We are told that the Union between Great Britain and Ireland has been so close in the past, and Ireland has gained so much by her military and Imperial connection, that she will, out of gratitude, go on paying for our debt and our military expenditure. Now, if there ever was a country which owed a great deal for military exertions on her behalf by others it was the American Colonies in the last century. It was the two great wars that England fought under Chatham and Wolfe which first gave security, and afterwards predominance, to America; and yet, when a British Minister came on the floor of the House and proposed that America should pay not a sum of £4,000,000, or of £1,000,000, but £100,000 a-year towards the military expenditure of this country, it raised a storm which only ended in the separation of the two communities. Let us go on now to another relation than that of the Colonial relations. It is said that Ireland is not a Colony, but that it is a nation. I think I may say that that was the gist of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in introducing this Bill. That was certainly the meaning of that most remarkable interpolation which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) threw into the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James)—an exclamation which had as great an oratorical success as any speech delivered in the debate; and this idea was put into shape, with his usual skill, by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said that the Prime Minister had made nations in Italy, Greece, and Bulgaria, and now he was going to make a nation of Ireland. Well, Sir, I agree with my right hon. Friend that the conduct of the Prime Minister in these cases was worthy of the right hon. Gentleman's greatest glories; but what sort of relations would Italy have had with Austria if out of the £55,000,000 she had to pay £33,000,000 to Austria? How would it be if Greece had to pay tribute to Turkey? And when the right hon. Gentleman quotes Bulgaria what an example does he give us? [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] Oh, if the right hon. Gentleman forgets the reference of the Chief Secretary for Ireland nobody else does. Bulgaria proper is bound to pay a tribute; but I believe—I am not certain of it—that the amount of that tribute has not yet been fixed, much less paid. But in the case of Eastern Roumelia she was bound to pay £200,000 a-year, and she paid it for some six years, and then, finding it very irksome, she got rid of Turkey and the tribute together. The fact is, from one end of Europe to the other, there is no instance of a nation with a separate Parliament and separate Executive paying the predominant part of its Revenue into the Exchequer of another nation. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General said that under the British Empire there were 30 separate Parliaments, which worked very well with the Imperial Parliament. There is not one of the 30 which pays us a halfpenny; and yet we are asked to give a second reading to this Bill as a declaration in favour of a separate Parliament and a separate Executive for Ireland, in the expectation that Ireland will in the long run do that which no nation, high-spirited or low-spirited, has ever yet done for a continuance of years, or ever will. But I am going too far afield to look for examples. I was tempted by the example of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bryce), who went 1,100 miles across the sea to Iceland. He had to go all that distance in order to find a country that would bear out his argument; and the day after he made that speech the Parliament of Iceland behaved in such a turbulent manner towards the country with which it was connected that it had to be suspended.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The liberties of Iceland were taken away by the same tyrant King who took away the liberties of Denmark.

MR. TREVELYAN: I prefer to go back to Ireland itself, and to the period regarded as the Golden Age of the relations between the two countries. In 1785, in the full swing of Grattan's Parliament, it was proposed that in the case of the hereditary Revenue exceeding a certain sum the excess should be applied to the maintenance of the Imperial Fleet. It was a very moderate proposal, compared with the proposal in this Bill, because it is proposed by the Bill that some £600,000 or £700,000 should be devoted to the Imperial Fleet; but in what way was it received?—

“The Member for Armagh in Grattan's Parliament declared that he could hardly contain his indignation while the hon. Member who proposed the scheme was speaking. He was astonished at his hardihood in making Ireland a tributary nation to Great Britain. The same terms were made out to America and rejected, and Ireland would reject them. It was well the hon. Member lived in a country remarkable for its humanity.”

Now, Grattan endorsed every word of this; and this was in a Parliament of landlords and Protestants, who were dependent on Great Britain for their safety and their property, and who agreed in general, although, no doubt, there were exceptions, with the main outlines of her foreign policy. But what would be the case in a Parliament which in all probability would not very much like our interference, who would not thank us possibly for our protection, and who I cannot think, from the views I know to be held by leading Irishmen in regard to foreign affairs, would always sympathize with us in any great military or diplomatic crisis either in America or Europe? If you refer to that Ireland on the other side of the Atlantic, whose public opinion we are told this Bill is intended to conciliate—it is not in one leading article or another, or in one speech or another, but the gist and tone and current of American thought all goes in the same direction. I was looking at the report of a great gathering in New York on Robert Emmett's day.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is the date?

MR. TREVELYAN: It was within the last month.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was it before this Bill was proposed?

MR. TREVELYAN: No; long after. I will read the passage, and the hon. and learned Member may judge for himself. Mr. Finnerty, speaking to these 10,000 people, said—

“Mr. Parnell has made no pledge of which Emmett might be ashamed. He has not said if Home Rule is granted the Irish quarrel is closed. I believe Irish ambition will not rest satisfied with the control of the Irish police. If there is an Irish Parliament there must be an Irish Army to protect that Parliament. If there be Irish commerce Ireland must have a Navy to protect that commerce. These are the properties of a free nation. It would seem to me very strange as an Irish legislator, if I were an Irish legislator, to have my seat in the old House on College Green, and looking out of the window to see patrolling before it English soldiers with rifles, bayonets, and plenty of ammunition ready to veto the Acts of that Parliament if England did not like them.”

I should never have read that passage if it stood alone.

MR. PARNEILL (Cork, City): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Finnerty is strongly in favour of dynamite?

MR. TREVELYAN: Well, I do not know about that; but I know this—that he was the chosen orator on a very great occasion, and that he addressed a multitude of his fellow-countrymen who are quoted at 10,000 people; and I am bound to say that I do not see anything very dishonourable in what Mr. Finnerty said on that occasion. I think it is exceedingly like the language—which I also think far from dishonourable—which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) is reported to have used himself, when he said—

"None of us in Ireland or America will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England."

MR. PARNELL: This is not the first time that this calumny has been uttered against me in this House; and as I contradicted the statement the first time it was ever made, some two or three years ago, in this House by the Gentleman who is at present Lord Ashbourne, I think I am entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give the authority for his quotation, the date of the speech, and the place where I am alleged to have made it.

MR. TREVELYAN: The place was Cincinnati. I do not remember the date; but if the hon. Member considers the words I have read to be calumnious, I withdraw them with regret. [Laughter.] I do not quite understand that laugh. I will put what I was going to say in another form. If the hon. Member states that he did not utter the words, I withdraw them at once; and if he considers them derogatory to him in any sense, I not only withdraw them, but express my regret for having used them. For my part, I do not consider them disgraceful. I will, however, withdraw them altogether.

MR. PARNELL: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, Sir, I think it necessary to ask the right hon. Gentleman for the date, and the place, and the name of the newspaper in which I was reported to have uttered these words. The right hon. Gentleman has not given me the date; he has given me the place—namely, Cincinnati. Perhaps the House will allow me to say that I have only been once in Cincinnati in all my life, and I have by me a verbatim report of both of the speeches which I made at Cincinnati on the day in question, five years ago, and no such words or any one of the words quoted by the right hon. Gentleman appears in those speeches. I may also further state that I have carefully looked over the reports of my speeches in other parts of America, in 1879 and in 1880. Of course, one cannot absolutely depend upon memory at such a long distance of time; but I cannot find in any one of the reports of those speeches which I brought with me from America any word or words such as those quoted by the right hon. Gentleman. With his permission, I will send the right hon. Gentleman, tomorrow, the newspaper which I brought back, five years ago, containing the original report of my speech at Cincinnati.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am always ready to accept a denial of words reported to have been used. I find that the date of the speech was the 23rd of February, 1880, and the paper from which I quoted it is The Irish World. I am certainly speaking under great disadvantage, in consequence of these interruptions, for which, however, I do not blame anyone, as they have undoubtedly a somewhat embarrassing effect upon a speaker in the midst of his observations. I can assure hon. Gentlemen, on the word of a man whose word has never been disputed, that I have read The Irish World very regularly for a long while past, and that the general tone of the speakers and articles is all in the sense which I have described—not the speeches of hon. Members in this House, but of those orators who address their Irish countrymen in America on stated and ceremonious occasions. The Prime Minister, in his Manifesto, says that the opponents of this Bill "fail to express confidence in the permanent success of their opposition." It would certainly be sanguine to express confidence in the success of an opposition to any measure introduced by the Prime Minister as the Head of the Liberal Party; but I must own that I feel little confidence as to the permanent success of the Ministerial proposals. I think they contain within them seeds of friction and collision; and I do not agree with the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Fenwick) that they do not contain seeds of an ultimate possible separation. Before I sit down I desire to come to that question which prevents me, above all others, from voting for this Bill in its present state—though I believe it could very easily be put into the shape in which I could vote for it—and that is the connection between this Bill and the Land Purchase Bill. You, Sir, have carefully laid down the degree to which the Land Purchase Bill may be alluded to in this debate, and I am not going to transgress your ruling. This is not a debate on the Land Purchase Bill, nor is it a debate on a Coercion Bill, yet every speaker who has supported this Bill from the Government side, has felt himself bound to say that he would vote for the second reading, because he would not vote for a Coercion Bill. I may, therefore, in the same way, be justified in saying that I believe this Bill will bring on the Land Purchase Bill as certainly as the supporters of the Bill think its rejection would bring on a Coercion Bill; and as I am every bit as much opposed to that Bill as they can possibly be to a Coercion Bill, I am justified, therefore, in voting against this Bill. I will only make one remark on the merits of the Land Purchase Bill in answer to the observations of the President of the Local Government Board. He said it was—

“Better and fairer for the Irish people, as well as for the landowning class, that we in this Imperial Parliament, together with the Irish Members, should settle the question and get it out of the way.”

I say that this Land Purchase Bill would not settle the question, that it would not get it out of the way; that all it would do would be to make the British taxpayers the ultimate landlords, and to transfer to them and the British Treasury all the odium and unpopularity that has gathered round the landlord class. There I will cease even to tread on the fringe of the forbidden ground. I come now to what I have undoubtedly a right to say, and that is that the Land Purchase Bill is very unpopular below the Gangway on this side of the House. I like it as little as any hon. Member can, and I intend to give it a rigid and strict resistance; but I think that they will not, for they intend to vote for the second reading of this Government of Ireland Bill, and in voting for that, as sure as the sun shines in heaven, they will vote for the second reading of the Land Purchase Bill. [“No, no!”] Some will do so willingly; others with regret; some in full faith in the great financial and administrative capacity of the Prime Minister; but a good many most reluctantly. Every day I see in the papers resolutions from Liberal Associations calling upon their Members to vote for the second reading of the Irish Government Bill, and at the same time expressing dislike and distrust of the Land Purchase Bill. Now, Sir, there never were men so deceived as the members of these Liberal Associations, and I say this the more willingly because it is a case of self-deception. The Government in this matter has been as fair and out-spoken as any Government could be. The Prime Minister, Earl Spencer, and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, and all the leading Members of the Government on this special question have all emphatically declared that the two Bills are inseparable, and from the nature of the case they must be inseparable. If the Home Rule Bill passes, not only will the Government feel itself bound to use its great and enormous influence to pass the Land Bill, not only will my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and his Friends vote for it, and of course hon. Members opposite, but I know of not a few quiet-going Radicals who have told me in private that if this Home Rule scheme be adopted they will vote for the Land Purchase Bill in justice to the Irish landlords. Knowing this, we who are opposed to the Land Bill, not in word only, but in deed and in truth—we who intend to vote against it, not because we are Radicals, or think our names ought to appear in such a division, but because we think it a bad Bill and one ruinous to the country—we oppose it here and now. The land policy of the Government is, among other things, to my mind to a great extent the condemnation of their Irish Government policy. If the nation, at the instance of the Government, deliberately sets up a particular system of administration and legislation, that system should be applied to all classes alike. A Government which is good enough for the manufacturer and the professional man and the shopkeeper, is good enough for the landlord, and the Land Purchase Bill is a confession that the Ministry dare not trust the new Government of Ireland—[Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] In justice to those who agree or disagree with me I hope I may be allowed to finish the sentence. The Land Purchase Bill is a confession that the Ministry dare not trust the new Government so far as to carry out the Land Act of 1881—the Land Act which in 1883 and towards the close of that year the Prime Minister described, and, as my experience as Irish Secretary tells me, described most truly, as having saved and rescued the security of landed property in Ireland. But there are other indications in this Bill that the Government are a little uneasy about their new policy. The Civil servants, the Resident Magistrates, and the humbler ministers of the law might have felt a certain confidence that the Government would have ventured to trust them and theirs to the new order of things, if it had not been for the extraordinary precautions taken for the safety of the Judges. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General says that we must not yield to fears that are ill-founded. If the fears of the Judges were ill-founded, Her Majesty's Government ought not to have yielded to them; if they were well-founded, I think the fact is a serious condemnation of the Bill. The Judges, we are told, if they have any misgivings about the future are to be allowed to abdicate their functions. But how about the Resident Magistrates and the Crown Solicitors and the Civil servants who have done their duty by this country? I think the House has not in this debate, except from the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Rathbone), heard what ought to be said about the fate in store for them. They are to be forced to go on serving a party of gentlemen with whom, like the Judges, they have been placed in relations more or less uneasy. They are forced to go on serving their new masters for two years, unless the Ministers of that Party choose to dismiss them. Now, I do not want to attribute any improper conduct to the future rulers of Ireland; but I do feel that the position of those Civil servants, after all that has been said about them in this House, and in the Press of Ireland, will be a very painful and anxious one. Hon. Gentleman opposite, speaking in all good faith, have denounced the Civil servants on charges general and particular with great vehemence, and those hon. Gentleman will now be their masters. Having made those charges they will be almost bound to get rid of a good many of them. Those Civil servants, like the Judges, will not get full pensions, but the well-known terms given on abolition of office. Everyone acquainted with Public Departments knows what that means. It is the system by which, when the staff of an Office has been reduced, the opportunity is taken to get rid of the least efficient members of the Service on retiring pensions. That is the ordinary operation; but here the very men who are most faithful to their duties, and who most efficiently carried out that system of government which was the system of the present Cabinet and of Earl Spencer, will be the very men who will most probably be sent about their business on those terms of abolition of office, which are meant to be given only to men who are bad bargains. Now, these difficulties and dangers, and others to which I might have referred, all come from the Imperial Government, as being on the eve, I suppose, of surrendering very quickly, and without calculating the result, all real and effective control of the country. I will not enter into the question whether the Imperial Parliament retains a real control, because I consider that has been given up by the most eloquent and subtle of those who have contended that that control was maintained. If any hon. Member doubts that assertion, I would refer him to the words in which the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs spoke in his argument of this control being one which would only be exercised on very special occasions indeed. The words used by my hon. Friend were that it is because the right of control by the Imperial Parliament has been abandoned that we have been landed in all this difficulty, from which we are asked to extricate ourselves by means of the Land Bill, and which is the real reason of all our differences upon the North of Ireland Question. A great deal of ridicule has been thrown on the North of Ireland Question by the Attorney General, who spoke of it with great ability and with great humour. The hon. and learned Gentleman observed that strong things had been said with regard to that question in 1869, at the time of the abolition of the Irish Church. I allow, as fully as he does, that there have been very foolish men in all times. But I may observe in reference to that time, that although strong things were said then we were not afraid of them; and what many people who have had experience of Ireland are afraid of now is not any strong things that may be said, but the very disastrous things that may be done. The Irish Church Abolition was carried out by an arrangement between the Imperial Parliament and all Ireland; whereas, in the present case, the dispute will lie between a Nationalist Parliament and a Nationalist Government and the minority of the North. I know very well that much that has been said upon this subject has been in the very worst taste. But that knowledge does not conceal from me the fact—which my experience of Ireland teaches me, and which has been stated over and over again in public by Earl Spencer—that there was great danger at one time of a collision occurring between the two Parties in the North of Ireland, and that had it not been that there was a strong Central Government, supported not only by the Army, but by the Resident Magistrates and the police, disturbances would have arisen which might have assumed the dignity as well as the horrors of a serious civil war. If these dangers were to be apprehended in 1883 and 1884, I see no reason why there should not be the same danger in 1886. It is because we propose to give up our hold upon law and order in Ireland that such dangers as these arise. It is for that reason that all persons who have offended the dominant Party in Ireland, in the country districts, are living in such a state of painful agitation. It is because we have given up our hold upon law and order that we cannot protect the Judges and the landlords, and that we have been obliged to bring in the Land Purchase Bill in order to shield them. Now, Sir, let me ask why cannot the Government alter this Bill in such a way as to obviate what appears to some of its most faithful and devoted followers to be very grave defects? I know that the concessions which I suggest may be said to be very large. It is a very large concession to the Imperial Parliament that the Government should keep the hold my right hon. Friend wishes to have upon law and order; but at the same time such a concession would leave still remaining an enormous benefit and boon to Ireland. I cannot believe that it will read well in history that a Liberal Government threw away the support of a good many Liberals because they would not keep a proper hold upon law and order—at all events, until this new system had been fairly tried. Now, Sir, I have done. The noble Viscount the Member for South Somerset, Viscount Kilcoursie, expressing what I hope were not in all things the sentiments of the Government, said that in the approaching division there would be found in the one Lobby those who were desirous that friendly and peaceful relations should subsist between Great Britain and Ireland—a matter which I do not at all dispute—and in the other Lobby the supporters of the Marquess of Salisbury. And then the noble Viscount went on to talk of a Dissolution having terrors for others, but perhaps none for him. If the noble Viscount had been 20 years in this House he would have known that there were Liberals as good as he—Liberals but for whose exertions in the cause of reform neither he nor any other Liberal like him would ever have sat in this House for South Somerset—who take a different view of the situation from him. As to the Dissolution, all I can say is that if my constituents think, as I believe they will not think, that in acting according to my conscientious belief on such a question as this I am unfit to be their Representative—then I fancy many besides me will think that the future conditions of holding a seat in Parliament are such as render it not worth the holding.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): We all admire the great and statesman-like qualities, the intellectual gifts, and the very high capacity of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. We must all agree that if it were possible to govern Ireland upon the existing system, and if anybody could have achieved success as its Governor, the right hon. Gentleman was just the man. But I do not think that even he will claim, when he writes his own biography, as he has written those of other distinguished men, that his administration of Ireland was a very great success. Therefore, when we find a right hon. Gentleman with such high attainments and so many very sympathetic qualities having made such a failure in Ireland asking the House to reject this Bill, I ask with what authority can he presume to speak on the measure of the Prime Minister? What qualities has he to entitle him to pronounce as a judge in this debate? As to his past experience, it is founded on failure—an experience, in point of fact, of failure and desertion. We are told that what Ireland wants is a firm Government—a Government of resolute action—to maintain the law with vigour and persistency. If it is impossible to find those qualities in the right hon. Gentleman opposite—the biographer of Fox—where are you to look for them? After two years of Office the right hon. Gentleman sickened of the task he had undertaken. Where is his Successor? In which of the ranks of the Liberal dissidents will he seek for a man to carry out Lord Salisbury's policy of coercion for 20 years, or is he prepared to give up the comforts of his own fireside and the pleasure of his literary studies for the sake of carrying out a policy of repression in Ireland for a period of 20 years? I have the utmost respect for the right hon. Gentleman, and it is because I have so high a respect for him that I despair of seeing any English Gentleman bringing to the solution of this Irish Question, under the present situation, greater qualities of head and heart than he has done. I would ask any hon. Gentleman who opposes this Bill to point to any other right hon. Gentleman better qualified than the right hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) to give effect to the existing system of the government of Ireland. And when such men as he have broken down, who are you going to get to carry on Castle government on the basis of the status quo? In this melancholy business we are confronted by the fact that while the right hon. Gentleman opposes this measure, it is very strongly supported by another statesman—Earl Spencer—who was connected with him in the government of Ireland. It is remarkable, that while the right hon. Gentleman served only two years in Ireland, and comes back from there so "cock-sure," Earl Spencer, who differs from him so greatly on this question, passed the entire period of his Viceroyalty of 1868 in that country, and was again there as Viceroy from 1882 down to the time of the fall of his Government. Nor did Earl Spencer desert Ireland before that event. I think it would have been highly instructive if the right hon. Gentleman had given the House some explanation of his reasons for leaving the side of Earl Spencer in Ireland. When we see that Nobleman, with his large experience of Ireland, supporting the Prime Minister, what weight are we to attach to the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman, whose experience is so much less, and whose opposition is on such unsatisfactory lines? I did expect to hear more fully from the right hon. Gentleman what the ground of his opposition really is. He said that very little alteration and modification would make the Bill acceptable to him. I fully expected, when he said so, that he would have told the House exactly what alteration he advocates. What is his plan? I admit, of course, that it is very easy to oppose any particular measure. Let me, however, take a different question by way of comparison. Let me take the question of religion. I belong to a particular religion, and the right hon. Gentleman belongs to a different one. It is easy to say—"Make a little alteration in your religion and it will be acceptable to me." Which of the Seven Sacraments are we to leave out? Which of the Ten Commandments must we re-edit? What are the precise alterations the right hon. Gentleman desires to make? I must say that after having entertained the House for a considerable period—and we always listen to him with attention and gratification—it would have been much more satisfactory if he had not sat down without giving an inkling of what his plan is. At present it is absolutely bottomless—precisely in the same condition as that in which the plan of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) has been left. Take, again, the question of religious distinction. The right hon. Gentleman says that a very little alteration would make this scheme acceptable to him. Now, there is a scheme before us. Members of different religions, who differ in controversial matters, do not hesitate to say what are the blots they hit upon in any particular religion, and what are the particular doctrines they themselves recommend in contrast. If the right hon. Gentleman is so very sure of his scheme in comparison with that of the Prime Minister, what are the doctrines and what are the dogmas he recommends? While a man may with great certainty recommend a particular religion as a vehicle of salvation, is there not any religion against which he could not take the most extraordinary and apparently the most logical objections? We can object to anything; but at present we have a scheme before us logical, consistent, and complete to a very great extent, which, if we destroy it, will result in negation. What are you going to put in its place? The right hon. Gentleman has put nothing in its place. Let the Liberal dissident Members going into the Lobby to record their vote on this Bill remember that they have a living scheme on the one side and the ghost of a scheme on the other. Will they vote for a ghost in one Lobby, or for a thing of flesh and blood in the other? Why is it that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who have satisfied themselves of the difficulties and the imperfections of the scheme of the Prime Minister, and who feel so strongly on the matter, cannot put forward a better scheme of their own? The right hon. Gentleman began his speech, as usual, by a series of quotations gathered from a distance of 3,000 or 4,000 miles. He quoted the authority of The Irish World. It is a singular thing that no Irish newspaper is ever quoted; and I will tell the right hon. Gentleman that if The Irish World is to be continually quoted against the Nationalist Party as a text-book, it would be at least more honest on his part if he had allowed us the privilege of reading that newspaper during the last three years. I do not know anything that can be supposed to degrade the art of government more than to put an official of high principles, of great honour, and of stainless character into a public position in Ireland and to compel him to open and read my letters and newspapers, and those of my friends.

MR. TREVELYAN: The last sentence uttered by the hon. and learned Member appears to cast a serious imputation on me. I had The Irish World sent to me, or I took it in. As to the rest of the hon. and learned Member's observations, I may say that I never read anybody's newspapers and I never opened anybody's letters in my life.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I had The Irish World sent to me also; but so long as the right hon. Gentleman was in Office I never got it. But as soon as the right hon. Gentleman left Office I received the newspaper once more. Even the Tory Government were ashamed to enter into this miserable business of the Grahamization of letters or newspapers. Not that there was anything in my letters which might not have been posted up at Charing Cross. I do not for a moment allege that the right hon. Gentleman did this himself; but if he did not do it, certainly he got someone to do it for him. What English Members have to consider is this—that if they reject this scheme, the alternative programme which is offered to them is that of high-minded Ministers like the right hon. Gentleman opposite going over to Ireland and getting low-minded officials to do their dirty work. The right hon. Gentleman has, I observe, adopted a tone very different from that with which he used to address the House when he was a Member of the Government. He does not charge us now with writing and editing articles which are as much part of the machinery of assassination as the dagger and the revolver. That was the declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman, not in this House, where we could answer him, and where we never scrupled to answer him, but where he was not so very fond of answering us. It was down at Hawick among his constituents, by whom he is always well received, that the right hon. Gentleman declared that the newspapers edited by my hon. Friend, and the articles written by myself, were as much part of the machinery of murder as the dagger and revolver. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman quote from the same paper now? Why does he go to The Irish World, if United Ireland was good enough for him to quote from during his term of Office? If The Freeman, The Nation, and other Irish papers provided him with sufficient matter to justify him in indicting them and us before his constituents, why does he now go away 4,000 miles to The Irish World? It is because for years The Irish World has never ceased to attack us—has been our enemy. He has tonight quoted a statement which my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) is alleged to have made in Cincinnati, and another by Mr. Finerty—both taken from The Irish World. Let me tell him this. We are sometimes taunted with being the recipients of American money. Any money I have received I should be happy to have acknowledged in public or in private. I spoke in Chicago, in December, 1881, at a meeting that followed a Convention attended by thousands of the representatives of the Irish race in America, and I told them that the policy of the Irish Leaders here "was no more to be influenced by American dollars than it was by English gold." That statement was cheered to the echo by the thousands who attended the meeting; but that sentence of the speech was mutilated in the report in The Irish World. It did not suit the book of that organ. It is idle to suppose for a moment that the millions of the Irish race, powerful, intellectual, and brave men, who are backing the people of Ireland, accept that newspaper as their only mouthpiece. Why, it was denounced by eight Bishops sitting in solemn conclave in Cincinnati so far back as 1880. I repudiate altogether the insinuation that we are advised or controlled by The Irish World. We are told that we have received money through it. It is quite true that we have received money through The Irish World. Let me say, that while I differ from many of the views of Mr. Patrick Ford, he is a man of unselfish aims and unquestionable motives. He never makes his appearance in public; he is an absolute recluse; he lives in a little house in Brooklyn, and does not go over to even his office in New York, and he is absolutely a writer in a closet. The Irish World, of course, was used by branches of the Land League as a medium for the acknowledgment of subscriptions. But the bulk of the subscriptions would be received all the same if The Irish World had never existed, as that paper was but their channel and not their cause. My hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) reminds me that the National League has never received any subscriptions from The Irish World; so that the state of things I am referring to existed four or five years ago. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted a statement of Mr. Finnerty's. Mr. Finnerty edits a newspaper in Chicago, and represented a district of Chicago in Congress. It is said that he made a speech on Emmett's day, but the right hon. Gentleman did not fix the day. This Bill was brought in on the 8th of April, and Emmett's day, as well as I remember, was on the 4th of March, and yet the right hon. Gentleman stated absolutely as a fact that the speech was made long after the Bill of the Prime Minister was brought in. It is perplexing when such statements are made by Gentlemen of the highest integrity, stainless character, and loftiest position, and it only shows in what a haphazard manner Irish questions are dealt with by right hon. Gentlemen who are not fully acquainted with Irish history. Now, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, while it gives us no foothold on which to decide the merits of this Bill, went into a number of points that appear to me might very well have been reserved for the Committee stage. The right hon. Gentleman especially went strongly against the financial part of the Bill. Will the right hon. Gentleman support us when we come to claim that a lower tribute be exacted from the Irish people? Because we have stated—my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork has stated most distinctly—that we claim a reconsideration of the financial provisions of the Bill. That being so, surely the question at issue is one of principle, and not of pounds, shillings, and pence, because I never will believe that the English people, who have paid so many millions for the liberation of the West Indian slaves, and who lavished their treasure and their blood like water in the Crimean War—perhaps for a mere idea—will, when they come to consider a question of peace with Ireland, reduce the issue to a matter of 6s. 8d. The peace of Ireland is worth more than £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 a-year. We are told that the Canadian people, the Australian people, and the people at the Cape pay nothing to England, and that the Irish people will be dissatisfied if they are not treated in a similar way. But the Cape, and Canada, and Australia do not have the British Army spending their money among them; I presume that the British Army alone spend something like £2,000,000 a-year in Ireland; and we have in addition, not only the British Navy, but a ready market for our produce. Supposing that the tribute is too high, and I feel that it is too high, I say—knowing to some extent the English people, and having watched the spirit in which they have treated this Bill—I say that when the amount of the tribute comes to be considered, for the sake of making a lasting and durable peace, the English people will evince no desire to drive a hard bargain so far as mere pounds, shillings, and pence are concerned. Let me tell hon. Members why. It is because you have a great Empire which is vulnerable at many points, and you have in that little Island across the water as martial a people as ever trod the surface of the globe. Their support to you in time of battle is worth a good deal more than could be purchased for £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 a-year. If you really cement the union of these two nations, and make the Irish people contented, and if ever a time of danger arises, and you call on Ireland for 100,000 men, while £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 might sometimes, perhaps, be got with friction, there would be little difficulty, in a pacified and prosperous Ireland, in finding brave men and strong arms to protect the Empire, and defend it in any strait in which it may be placed. This is not a question to be treated as it has been—treated as a mere mathematical or arithmetical question to be decided by rule of thumb. That would be the most monstrous proposition that has ever been placed before this House. You are dealing not with pounds, shillings, and pence, but with flesh and blood—with a people who have been accused of being a sentimental people, but who are, at any rate, a warm-hearted and a sympathetic people. I venture to think that nobody could have believed—certainly I could not—that such a change could be wrought upon the minds and consciences of an entire nation as has been wrought by the speech of the Prime Minister on the 8th April last. I have myself fought the Government in this House as hard as anybody. I have not been afraid or ashamed, either here, or in Ireland, or in America, to express my sentiments. But I will go back to the Chicago Convention, or to any Convention that may be called in Dublin tomorrow; and though we are told by the right hon. Member for the Border Burghs that we are young men, who in 30 years' time may be Ministers, and that being young we might rashly pledge our people, I say we should be able from any Convention of the Irish race at home or abroad to obtain the acceptance of this Bill. The Irish race has manifested in a thousand ways that it supports us in our acceptance of this measure. That being so, no deductions that may have been drawn from the past speeches of hon. Members in this House, or of the Irish people at home or abroad, are in point in the consideration of this measure. When Irish Members fought in this House in former times, they felt as it were that they were addressing a Government whose ears were stuffed with lead. But we have now found out the difference. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say that I have been deeply touched and moved, not only by the public and private utterances of hon. and right hon.

Gentlemen, but by the private sympathy shown to us by English gentlemen in this House and out of it. And an extraordinary change has come over many of the English newspapers. In past times the difficulty was to gain the ear of the English people. "England had the ear of the world," John Mitchel said, and it could pour into it what calumnies it pleased. But now, through the most powerful newspapers such as The Manchester Guardian, The Manchester Examiner, The Newcastle Chronicle, The Birmingham Daily Post, and other leading Provincial journals, a different tone is running. The speeches and declarations of the Irish Members were misquoted and misrepresented; but now some of your country organs are copying our speeches direct from the Irish National newspapers. To give an idea of the way in which the Irish Members have been misrepresented in the Press by a gang of conspirators in Dublin, who purvey news to England, I may say that it was telegraphed to The Newcastle Chronicle, on the day on which Earl Spencer made his speech in Newcastle, that I had declared that I had never withdrawn, and never would withdraw, anything that I had said with regard to Earl Spencer. Now, what were the facts? I really spoke in the opposite sense, and I said that I should withdraw nothing till the contrary was proved; but I went on to draw a comparison between Earl Spencer's action and the magnanimity of his conduct and character, and that of some other right hon. Gentlemen who were acting very much like the right hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). But all the context was omitted, and the whole tone and purpose of my remarks deliberately and shamefully misrepresented. But I will assume that the Irish Members are a thoroughly bad lot, that they are thoroughly unregenerate, and that they have made speeches which no Englishman would approve. I will take the estimate of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Sanderson), who quotes our speeches, and says—"Will you place Ireland under the rule of men like these?" I admit that I and my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. W. O'Brien) have made speeches which are objectionable from an English point of view. Men who have been months in gaol without trial are not generally very amiable; but are we to live for ever, and is Ireland for all eternity to be condemned to slavery for speeches made in a passing moment by some of her ephemeral Representatives? At the very most the Irish Members now in the House of Commons cannot control the destinies of Ireland for more than a generation. Are the toiling peasants who have been rack-rented and crushed, are the fishermen who have been deprived of the means of carrying on their industry, and are the artizans who are poverty-stricken to be deprived of their rights, because their Representatives in times of crimes and passion have made speeches a little stronger than usual in English controversies? The thing is absurd. Are the speeches of a particular set of Irish Members, which are quoted at the present time, any ground for refusing to the nation at large its Magna Charta? It is precisely as just as if King John had quoted the speeches of the Barons, before they wrung Magna Charta from him, and asked if he was called upon to forget the views of such wicked and turbulent nobles. When Irishmen were treated unjustly, they spoke one way; when justly, another. There is no inconsistency in their attitude, when your attitude is also changed. I think we may claim for the Irish people the same qualities as other people possess. I think that, taking them as a whole, we may claim for this Party—a Party coming here at a great distance from their farms, their workshops, counting-houses, and professions—that it represents as much intelligence, and, perhaps, although I should not say so, as much righteousness and conscientiousness as any other Party in this House. Let hon. Members compare them with the Loyal minority. I say, do they not show as much worth as the claimants of a monopoly of the intelligence, culture, and wealth of Ireland? We cannot admit North-East Ulster's modest claim to all the talents and all the virtues. When England wanted statesmen, she did not care from what part of Ireland she got them; she did not ask whether Burke was a Cork man or an Ulster man, or whether or not Lord Wolseley was a Northerner; and whenever the question was asked, the Duke of Wellington's capacity was allowed, although he was born near Dublin. Having had these products from Ireland in the past, having had the privilege of giving you Irish Premiers, and the leadership of Irish Generals, I venture to think that the people of Ireland are just as capable of carrying out a moderate and sober system of self-government as any people on the globe. The right hon. Gentleman says that a terrible state of things will arise in Ireland if this Bill is passed. I should like to ask him what state of things will arise if it does not pass? Has the right hon. Gentleman considered that point at all? Will he, like Olivier, with a light heart go into the Division Lobby against the Prime Minister's Bill? Is he quite sure that the effect of not passing this Bill will not be greater than the evils of not passing it? We know the evils of the present system; but we know nothing of the mischiefs of the future system, except from the prophecies of the right hon. Gentleman. Grattan well said—"You cannot argue with a prophet; you can only disbelieve him." And that being so, I ask English Gentlemen, who are only opposed to some of the details of the Bill, to consider whether they are prepared to take the tremendous risks of opposing the Bill, and plunging Ireland into all the disastrous consequences which I venture to think will ensue—consequences tenfold worse than anything which has arisen out of the previous system of government there. There is another reason why the present time should be chosen for passing the Bill. For the first time in modern history the Irish people have shown a receptive temper. For the first time in your history a statesman has brought forward a great measure for Ireland, when not under the threat of civil war, under no pressure of foreign complications, nor because any prison has been blown down at home, but simply on the dictates of his own experience. It is this, I say, which recommends the scheme of the Prime Minister to the Irish people, and has produced a softness of heart towards him—that they observe the right hon. Gentleman bringing in the Bill under the circumstances I have described. Is it, then, desirable to allow this acceptable moment to pass away? Is it desirable to thwart, to battle with, and to obstruct one whom every hon. Gentleman opposite, however he may differ from him, must recognize as the first English statesman of the century? And, if he cannot settle this great question at the present moment, which of your puny whipsters is going to settle it hereafter? When we were only about 40 in number, and about 20 in effective strength, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs was not so fond of standing up against us at that Table. He told his constituents at Hawick that sometimes he would rather face a pitched battle than that little handful of 20 men. Would he, after the Irish people have been angered, and this Party trebled in strength, like to be the Minister to carry through this House some petty scheme for County Boards? Instead of facing a pitched battle, I think he would rather stand a siege than do anything of the kind. But, in dealing with this measure, hon. Gentlemen address themselves to difficulties with which all are familiar; they address themselves to points of detail, and not to principles; and I say that is the advantage we have in this scheme being brought forward by a statesman who has had all these difficulties of detail presented to him, in the Canadian Settlement, the Australian Settlement, the Cape Settlement, and others. We are told that this scheme will lead to separation; that it will lead to the dismemberment of the Empire; that it will lead to the oppression of the Loyal minority; that it will set class against class; that the Civil Service will be ruined, and that every class which has supported the Empire through thick and thin will be constrained, despoiled, and isolated. Is there one of these prophecies from which the Prime Minister, 50 years ago, has not learned his A B C? I take the speech of Lord Derby, then Lord Stanley, on the Canadian Settlement in 1837. He said—and anyone would imagine it was the Member for the Border Burghs speaking—

“What would be the consequence of granting the Canadian demand? The establishment of a French Republic in Lower Canada. The concession of legislative independence will remove the only check to the tyrannical power of the dominant majority.”

“A majority in numbers only, for in wealth, in education, and in enterprize it is greatly inferior to the minority of settlers of British descent.”

Now we have the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Saunderson), for Lord Stanley went on—

“If these settlers find themselves deprived of British protection, they will protect themselves; measures to this effect will be taken within six months after the concession is made.”

The hon. Member for South Belfast—I will not call him gallant—said, at a meeting of the Royal Black Hobabs in Dublin last December, that the very first day after the introduction of this measure there would be the signal for civil war in Ireland. Lord Stanley added—

“Numerically the English settlers were in a minority, but that assistance would not be withheld from them by their comrades in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, or, if need be, in Great Britain. They were British subjects claiming protection against a tyrannical majority, and only asking to be left in the enjoyment of their liberties as British subjects.”

I presume that the Prime Minister, 50 years ago, heard all that; I presume at the time he was greatly alarmed; but apparently he has since been able to recover from his fears. The stuff about civil war now talked he has heard a dozen times over generations ago. We have, then, a scheme brought forward by a Minister who remembers similar controversies before most of us were born, who is aware of the threats and thunderbolts that were hurled against former schemes of legislation, and who pledges his success and his reputation in the evening of his days, when his career is not only dear to his fellow-countrymen, but to himself, and when he must be anxious to hand down to posterity the record of a successful and glorious life—we have him now coming forward with this Bill; and is it likely that, with an experience greater than all of ours, he would bring in any Bill likely to make his name in future generations hateful to Englishmen? We hear hon. Gentlemen talk of their duty, their constituents, and of their desire to preserve the British Empire untarnished in its lustre; but are they more patriotic than the Prime Minister? Have they contributed more than he has to the greatness of the Empire, or given to the Throne a firmer foundation in the hearts of Her Majesty's subjects, than the Minister who, with his hoary experience, pledges his past and future fame to the success of this measure? Sir, I say, then, that for the passing of this measure, this is the acceptable time. This is not a closed, a secret Assembly. Every word which is spoken here is telegraphed where-soever the English language is spoken; and Members like the late Irish Secretary should be cautious what language they hold, lest anyone should be able to point to the words of men like him as a proof that this Bill was grudgingly given, and, therefore, that there should be no gratitude for it, and no generous recognition of the sympathetic attitude of the English people. No room should be given by such speeches for enemies to misrepresent that attitude; and I say, if we are able to pass this measure in the spirit in which it is conceived, it can never be said that it was granted in sullenness and distrust, and that the Irish people will, therefore, not accept it, merely to wrest further advantages from the English people, and to separate the two countries. But I fear lest those arguments are likely to be used if the Bill is thrown out, and if the whole question is again plunged, as it were, into a seething cauldron. We hear a great deal about the Irish people being cursed by Party spirit, and of the miseries which have been brought on the country by this being made a Party question. Treat it, then, as an International question between two peoples, and the union between the two Democracies will not long be delayed; and I say let every man be heedful of the consequences of stepping in between them. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General quoted from a remarkable speech addressed to the House in 1869 upon the question of the Irish Church Act, and perhaps it may be of some interest to hon. Members to know what was the exact position taken up in the past times by the Orange Society, of which we hear so much, and of its determination to resist this measure to the death. Will the House be surprised to hear that this Orange Society, after the passing of the Irish Church Act, passed a very remarkable resolution? One of the chief Articles of the Society is that its members are pledged on oath to maintain the Union. I am speaking in the presence of some distinguished members of that Organization, and I ask what happened when the Irish Church Act passed? This resolution was proposed by the Chairman, Brother Edward Waller, Deputy Grand Master—

Mr. T. M. Healy

“That all statements and provisions in the objects, rules, and formularies of the Orange Institution which impose any obligation on its members to maintain the Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland, be expunged therefrom.”

That resolution was carried by a majority of 22 to 18. Lord Enniskillen, the Grand Master, in a letter to a Dublin newspaper dated February 5, 1871, denied that such a resolution had been carried; adding that if it had been, he and other members of the Institution would have withdrawn from it immediately. The truth, however, is that the resolution was carried by the majority of 22 to 18 votes; but in order to carry any resolution to change the constitution of the Orange Order, a two-thirds majority is required. Who started the Home Rule movement in Ireland? It was the Protestants and the Orange Society.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to contradict that statement.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Great latitude must be allowed to the hon. Member for Belfast here. When we meet him in the field, in the contest with which he threatens us, perhaps we may have to take stronger measures. I say that the Home Rule movement in Ireland was started by the Protestants and by the Orange Society. Nearly every man who met Isaac Butt at the meeting on May 17th, 1870, after the passing of the Irish Church Act, was a Protestant, and many of them were Orangemen. Who acted as Secretary to the great Home Rule Convention of 1873? It was a gentleman of the name of Colonel King-Harman. These men raised the flag of Home Rule, and we nailed it to the mast; and so much was this the case that no less a person than Cardinal Cullen, who being a staunch Churchman, and perhaps somewhat doubtful as to the proceedings of the new Protestant Nationalists, took alarm at the idea of the country getting into the hands of those Orange and Protestant Nationalists, whom he considered to be acting in pique at the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, and without any serious intention to permanently stand by their country. And so it proved, for when the Conservative Government came into Office and were able to give away dignities and offices, the support of Loyalists and others melted rapidly away. But let us consider some of the resolutions passed by those gentlemen at that time.

On July the 9th, 1870, a resolution was passed denouncing the Party Processions Act of Mr. Chichester Fortescue as—

"Inconsistent with the rights of freemen and one to which we shall never submit, and which forces upon us the conclusion that England can no longer be permitted to legislate for this country, and we hereby declare that Irishmen shall no longer be slaves in their own land, and we call upon all classes of Irishmen by every legal means to assist our Organization in gaining their freedom."

I appeal to the hon. Members for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain), and North Armagh (Major Saunderson)—even supposing that we are wrong in the view we take of Irish liberation, I say, you, at least, are the minority; we are the majority. You have for the last 500 or 600 years been in the possession of the good things, while we have been left out in the cold; you have occupied high places, while we have been in prison. You have been in Office, and we have been in exile; you have been landlords, we have been the evicted. You see the Irish people like a captive bird beating out its heart against the bars; would it not be worth your while to say we will make some sacrifice in the interests of common humanity for the sake of the enormous majority of the Irish people? Can you not say that you view with pity the fact that thousands of Irishmen in each generation find their way to prison; that millions have been driven across the Atlantic; that you view their sorrows with regret, and that you will see if a change cannot be effected, some better system devised—in short, that you will grant to Ireland a measure of local government such as that which is proposed by the Prime Minister? I say that would be the attitude of statesmen and of patriots; it would be the attitude of Gentlemen seriously desirous for the good, not of a particular class or of a particular religion, but of the country at large; and I maintain that no knot or section of the people in a corner of the land has the right to obstruct the path to peace and freedom of the masses of the nation. I claim from them, if they are really the Representatives of the wealth, education, and intelligence of the country, as they allege, that they should make a sacrifice and resign themselves to the working out of a plan which their fellow-countrymen feel convinced that the prosperity of our common country requires. We are told they are the cream of the population and its heaviest taxpayers. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh Mr. Goschen was good enough to say the other day that Ulster paid the greater part of the taxes of Ireland. Sir, I think it a monstrous thing that a Gentleman occupying the position of the Member for Edinburgh should make a declaration of that kind, and lend the authority of his financial reputation to a deceitful and inaccurate piece of figure-cooking. The right hon. Gentleman arrived at his conclusion by simply taking Schedule D, which relates to Income Tax from trades and professions alone, and omitting Dublin from the calculation. The taxes paid by the agricultural population are not included in that Schedule at all. As nearly all Ireland lives by farming, I think it would have been more decent if the right hon. Gentleman had presented a more candid statement to the House. Although the right hon. Gentleman said that Ulster was the richest portion of Ireland, the fact is that there are 14 counties in Leinster and Munster richer than any county of Ulster, and these 14 counties pay more money in the shape of taxes than any Ulster county. Dublin pays in Income Tax three times more than Belfast, and Waterford, with the same population, three times more than Derry. As to the allegation that Ulster is superior in point of education, I will content myself with pointing out that in Dublin, where the population exceeds that of Belfast by 50,000, there were at the last Election only 869 illiterate voters, while in Belfast the number was 1,559. Even the people in Munster are more literate than in Ulster—turn it as you will, in wealth and intelligence, experience shows that Ulster is below both Leinster and Munster. I read with great regret the other day a speech delivered by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). The noble Marquess has been a bitter opponent of this Bill; he has made many straightforward and honest attacks upon it, and has not attempted to get rid of it by a side-wind. He has not attempted to stab the Prime Minister with a blade lubricated with compliment. He has attacked him in front and not behind, though he has made some statements regarding the Irish Members which he might very well have left unsaid. He says now that he is willing that certain changes should be made in the government of Ireland, though three years ago he declared that it would be madness to grant Ireland anything in the way of local self-government until Irish Members had given guarantees that they would not use it as a weapon for obtaining separation. The Irish Members are now prepared to give guarantees, but the noble Marquess will not accept them. Whatever course we take an excuse is invented to thwart us. Now it is our sincerity that is impugned, and the meanest motives for our acceptance of the Bill are attributed. Because, forsooth, some of us may, if it passes, become salaried Ministers, it is insinuated our mouths are being sealed with prospective hush-money. I must say that in regard to men who have fought the battle as we have fought it—many of whom have faced gaol and exile, hardships and ignominies, in a cause we were proud to suffer for—he might have spared us the reflection that we regarded the Bill in the light of a gigantic personal bribe. I can draw no other conclusion from this portion of the speech of the noble Marquess at Bradford, in which he says that these leaders and teachers of the Irish people have every reason to be satisfied with the prospect which is now opening before them. He says that for us there is opening a prospect of political power and influence within our own country—to us is opening a prospect of the spoils of political victory; but that the people to whom our teaching has been addressed will, but to a small and limited extent, be sharers in our joys and satisfaction. To tell us, who have been willing to face every risk that men could face to bring this question to the point it has now reached, and who would not hesitate, if victory seemed once more as far off as it but so lately did, to fight the battle all over again, that we are now accepting this Bill because of the spoils and satisfactions, is, perhaps, the greatest insult that could be addressed by one Member of this House to another. True, it is not, perhaps, a greater insult than was addressed by the chief supporter of the noble Marquess—namely, The Times newspaper—to his own followers, when it reminded the noble Marquess that, once in power, and once the master of patronage, on the defeat of this Bill, he would have very little difficulty in filling up the minor Offices of a Government with Gentlemen of flexible consciences. Perhaps a perusal of that suggestion in The Times infected the minds of the noble Lord in regard to men of whose action his present political acquaintances supply no standard. Sir, we Irish Members have filled offices in Ireland, but they were offices in the cells of Kilmainham and Richmond Gaols. We did not hesitate to face odium and obloquy in this House when we could have won its favour in past times; and to tell us, as the noble Marquess has told us, that we are agreeing to these things for the sake of some paltry remuneration which an Irish State can give, is about, perhaps, as contemptible a form of argument as ever entered the head of even a British aristocrat. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen) tells us that the passing of this Bill will drive wealth out of Ireland. Well, Sir, we may drive wealth out of Ireland if we act like some other people who have had the management of a system of government in the East—I believe that some English Gentlemen have had the government of Egypt in their hands, and have managed, to some extent, to drive wealth out of that country. They have not hesitated, in that poor country, to dabble in its Stocks and in its Loans; and though, perhaps, our credit in Ireland may not be very high, I venture to think that some Gentlemen who are now doing their best to defeat this Bill will not be backward in encouraging us to issue loans. I venture to say that an Irish State will not be established three years before its Stocks will have been bulled and beared by some such firm as Goschen and Fröhling. When all these prophecies of corruption are indulged in, and all these imputations of mercenary motives are made, I wonder what it is we have done to deserve them. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Saunderson) taunted my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. W. O'Brien) with being in receipt of American money. I am almost ashamed in my hon. Friend's presence to mention a fact to which I will venture to allude. A fund was raised six months ago for my hon. Friend, to defend him against the persecution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). A sum of over £1,000 was left as a balance of that fund, which was freely given by my hon. Friend, who signed a cheque for the amount, and sent it to his poor fellow-townsmen of the town of Mallow, and that irrespective of creed or class. But why are we to be taunted in this manner? Are we Irishmen, I might almost say, as was asked of the Jew, not men like yourselves? What is it that has driven the Irish Representatives into the position they have taken up? What is it that has compelled them to speak words of anger and of ferocity, I might almost say, and of defiance in this House? You drove them to do it; and just as they have been driven to exhibit these human feelings by one line of conduct, may they not by the adoption of another line be made to exhibit quite an opposite set of feelings? I believe, Sir, in the alchemy of justice, in its efficacy and permanent effects. I believe the Irish people are deeply touched and deeply moved by the present attitude of this country towards them. Englishmen have seen with joy and satisfaction the efforts of the men who have fought for liberty in Greece, in Bulgaria, Poland, and Italy. The same Englishmen will consider the object of this Bill, and will see that the difficulties and tyrannies we have suffered under have been far worse than those they have assisted to put an end to in other countries. They will see that the people who are labouring under these evils, though perhaps not so picturesque, are in the main as worthy of their sympathy; that they have human hearts and human souls; that, at any rate, they are Her Majesty's subjects; and Englishmen will feel that while they did no wrong to the Poles, the Italians, the Bulgarians, and the Greeks, they have done wrong to us. They will do us some reparation, make some attempt to banish our woes, our poverty, and our sufferings. We have heard no note of sympathy or pity in any of the speeches which have come from Liberal Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House against this Bill. Tory Gentlemen, who were bound to oppose it, have felt themselves compelled to utter some friendly words of sympathy with the Irish people. Nearly every Tory Member who has spoken has declared that it is with regret that he feels himself bound to offer opposition to the measure. Is it the Liberal dissidents alone who have their hearts hardened? I ask them not to be led away by difficulties. There are blots on the sun, and though there may be blots on the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, those blots are small indeed compared with the blots you would create on the hearts of the Irish people by its rejection. You have resisted and prevented every Irish reform for centuries. I appeal to you now to give us this boon with a free and generous hand; and if you do I can promise that the Irish people will be willing to join you in every endeavour to make this Realm what we all desire it should be made—an Empire of which every citizen may be proud, and against which no reproach can be brought by reason of the sorrows or the wrongs of any race within its ample boundaries.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS (IMPROVEMENT EXPENSES) (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Dodds, Sir Edward Reed, Mr. Arnold Morley, Mr. William Cook, Mr. Bullard.)

BILL 7.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 18th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

In the Committee.

Clause 2 Interpretation.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): I do not wish to press any Amendment to any portion of this clause; but desire merely formally to move to omit the words in the 2nd paragraph, from line 24 to line 27, in order to put to my right hon. Friend who represents the Government in this matter (Mr. Stansfeld), and to my hon. Friend in charge of the Bill (Mr. Dodds), certain difficulties which might occur under these words. I do not know whether any hon. Members in this House, who represent rural interests, are aware of the fact that this Bill applies to a very large number of rural districts. It is a Bill prepared by Municipal Corporations who have chiefly had in view, I think, the interests of urban districts. But the measure deals with urban districts which are merely technically urban districts—for instance, large Local Board districts, which often contain numerous parishes, and this is particularly the case in Yorkshire; and there are a large number of rural districts that have urban powers. We have, therefore, to look at the Bill, not only as an urban, but also as a rural measure. Under the words I refer to this might occur—a road might be held to be a street, though those who have been engaged in preparing the Bill might never have expected that it would have been possible for it to be so considered. Take the case of a man laying out an estate. He makes a gravel road through it, with streets sketched out in the same manner, with a view to recommending the sale of certain plots for building purposes. Plans are prepared and put up at railway stations and at other convenient places, with a view to the better sale of the land. In most of these cases all the land belongs to one man; but there are cases in which there is more than one owner of such building land, although one man possesses by far the larger quantity. The Local Authority may be greatly under the influence of the man laying out the land, and in such a case a great hardship might be inflicted upon the other proprietors of land along the new street or adjoining it. The gravel road might be held to be a street, under this Bill, for the reason that ultimately it is intended to use it as a street. In this way a man may be forced to contribute largely to the expense of making the street, though he might derive no benefit from it, and not only that, but although he may be altogether opposed to the speculation. I formally move to leave out these words. I do not intend to press the Amendment; but I wish to ask the attention of the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to the point. He is perfectly familiar with rural districts; and I would ask him whether, in his opinion, there would not be likely to be some hardship in these words—

“Includes any land laid out as a street, whether or not buildings have been erected on either side thereof.”

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 24, to leave out the words “‘Street,’ in addition to having the meaning assigned to it by the ‘Public Health Act, 1875,’ includes any land laid out as a street, whether or not buildings have been erected on either side thereof.”—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

MR. DODDS (Stockton): The right hon. Gentleman, apparently, has not fully considered Clause 7 of the Bill, by which ample provision is made to secure that owners of property abutting on a street shall not be charged a higher amount towards the expenses of the paving, flagging, sewerage, and so on, of the street than the benefit which it is considered likely to confer upon them. The Bill applies not merely to urban, but also to rural districts. It applies, in fact, to every road in regard to which Clauses 151 and 152 of the Public Health Act are in operation.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We must not lose sight of the fact that the rural Sanitary Authority may take a different view of the question whether or not an owner adjoining a proposed new street is benefited to the view the owner himself may take. I think, as I have already said, that serious objection may be taken to the words I have referred to; but, as I said before, I do not propose to press my objection to them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Stansfeld) (Halifax), the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 15, leave out “more than one person is the owner,” and insert “two or more persons are the owners.”

MR. CARBUTT (Monmouth, &c.): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 25, at end of the Clause, to add the words—“‘Owner,’ in addition to having the meaning assigned to it by ‘The Public Health Act, 1875,’ shall, where the lands or premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon any street are held upon a building lease subject to a ground rent, include the freeholder or lessor, who shall become liable to be charged with the expenses of executing the private street works jointly with the ‘owner,’ as defined in ‘The Public Health Act, 1875,’ and in proportion to the benefit to be derived by him from such private street improvements, regard being had not only to the ground rent payable to him, but also to the number of years remaining unexpired under the building lease."—(Mr. Carbutt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I cannot accept the Amendment, which would introduce a new definition of the word "owner." The Courts have given decisions which have bestowed upon the word a distinct and clearly-defined meaning, and to introduce this Amendment into a Bill intended only to extend the sections of the Public Health Act of 1875, would be to introduce serious confusion. I, therefore, must ask the Committee to refuse to pass this Amendment.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to support the Amendment; and I trust that even if the hon. Member cannot accept it, he will endeavour to meet the grievance which it is obviously intended to remove.

MR. DODDS: It may be desirable to meet the grievance, but it is not in the power of a private Member to introduce a Bill for the purpose. This measure has been designed for the purpose of meeting the imperfections in the Act of 1875. I cannot hold out to the hon. Member any hope that we shall be able to deal with the point in this Bill. A time, no doubt, may come when it may be possible to introduce a Bill to remove the grievance the hon. Member wishes to meet.

MR. CARBUTT: The grievance of which I complain is felt so keenly in a very large number of towns where land is let on small leases that I think it would be well to go to a division.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. STANSFELD, Halifax): I must ask my hon. Friend not to press his Amendment to a division. It seems quite clear that the Amendment as it stands will not effect the object in view. In the next place, the Amendment makes the Sanitary Authority the judges of the proportions in which the liability shall be charged upon the owner or the freeholder. That, I think, is very objectionable.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I hardly understand how the Sanitary Authority can be proper judges of the proportions to be paid by one set of men, and not proper judges in case of a division between the lessor and the lessee. Surely, if they can judge in the one case they can judge in the other. But I submit to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) that the Sanitary Authority is not the final judge—there is a higher authority.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 76: Majority 14.—(Div. List, No. 107.)

Clause 2, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Private street works).

On Motion of The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Stansfeld) (Halifax) the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 26, leave out "any urban district," and insert "the district of any sanitary authority."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): I beg to move formally the omission of the words "two months" in page 3, line 11, and the insertion of "one month," in order to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman who represents the Government to the clumsiness of this Bill in regard to its working. The Metropolitan system, which is a different one to that proposed by this Bill on this point, works very quickly indeed. This Bill will take from 12 weeks to 12 months to work in each case. The shortest possible period in which the expenses can be calculated and the works begun will be 12 weeks, and, on the average, about six months will be occupied in getting the work in order. I think that is too long. I merely mention the matter to see whether the right hon. Gentleman can suggest anything by which the Bill can be brought into operation more speedily.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 11, to leave out the words "two months" in order to insert the words "one month."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two months' stand part of the Clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. STANSFELD, Halifax): My attention has not been directed to the point raised by my right hon. Friend, and therefore I cannot pronounce on the subject now. I shall be very happy to consider the matter, and, if possible, meet his views.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Objections to proposed works).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): As the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson) is not present, I will move the first Amendment which stands in his name—it is to leave out "majority in number" in line 26. That will raise a question which we can raise again in a few minutes, probably in a more convenient form. It is very difficult to see why Clause 4 is drawn in the form in which it is drawn. The Committee will see there are two parts to Clause 4. In one of those parts a single owner can stop the proceedings under the Bill; but by the other portion of the clause a majority of owners is required to stop the proceedings. I admit that upon some of the legal points it may be a wise proceeding; but surely a different system might prevail upon the points which are really matters of fact. The Sub-sections (a) and (d) seem to me to be on all-fours with the cases contemplated in the second part of the clause; and, therefore, after hearing what my hon. Friend (Mr. Dodds) has to say, I shall be inclined to move to take Sub-sections (a) and (d) out of the first part of the clause, in order to put them in the second part of the clause. This Amendment seems to raise the same question, and, therefore, I move it. As to the question of majority, there is another point which we ought to take in view, and it is this—that probably very many cases will arise in which there is no majority, where there are only two owners concerned, and they take opposite views. The word "majority" would not meet that case at all.

Question proposed, "That the words 'majority in number' stand part of the Clause."

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to propose the whole of the Amendments standing in the name of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson)?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I want to hear what hon. Members opposite have to say in support of their Amendments as they stand on the Paper. The question in regard to the first part of the case would be best raised, I think, not by the Amendment which I have moved in the name of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson), but by moving to leave Sub-sections (a) and (d) out of the first part, and putting them in the second part of the clause. The other point as to the majority is a very difficult one. I put it before the Committee as one which concerns rural and not urban districts. In rural districts you frequently find cases in which only two persons are interested, and in which, therefore, there cannot be a majority. Hon. Members opposite are probably more interested in that point than I am myself.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): The Amendment of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson) has been fully considered by those who are associated with the promotion of this Bill; and, on the whole, we think that the form in which the clause stands is preferable to that suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I shall be glad to hear what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) has to say on the subject. Personally, I am in favour of the clause as it stands.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. STANSFELD) (Halifax): The question is a very proper one for discussion. The objections are—

"That the alleged street is not within the meaning of this Act; that the street is wholly repairable by the inhabitants at large; that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses are excessive," and so on; and the proposal of the Bill is that all these objections can be made by at least one-half of the owners of the property in the street, and that the objections which any single owner may raise shall be objections in respect of his own property alone. The real question for us to decide is whether the first class of objection should be raised by an individual owner.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): As to the word "majority," there is considerable force in the suggestion of my hon.

Mr. Stansfeld

Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and we shall be glad to consider the matter by Report. I think the Amendment may be made.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): I am glad the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has consented to consider by Report the question of the advisability of retaining the word "majority." The matter, as put by the President of the Local Government Board, was, perhaps, a little misleading to hon. Gentlemen from the rural districts. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the majority of the owners in the street; but one, and probably the most important, point is, whether it is a street or not. A rural authority may wish to have a gravel path made into a street, or to have it known as a street. The point is whether, in such a case, we should insist upon a man representing the majority of owners before he can be heard in the matter at all. I think in such a matter any owner ought to be heard.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Stansfeld) (Halifax), the following Amendment made:—Page 3, line 29, after "or the," insert "owners or."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): I moved the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson) to see whether hon. Members opposite had considered the Amendment. The Amendment, which would meet the view I have put forward, would be to take Sub-sections (a) and (d) out of the first part of the clause and put them in the second part. That would insist on power being given to any one owner to object in a case where it was alleged the alleged street was not a street, and also in a case where the proposed works were insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses were excessive. I would leave (b) and (c), which are legal points, to be dealt with in the manner proposed in the clause; but the matters of fact which would most frequently arise I propose to put in the second part of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, to leave out "(a.) That the alleged street is not a street within the meaning of this Act."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I think that, on the whole, the suggestion of my right hon. Friend will be an improvement of the clause, and therefore I shall be happy to agree to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

On Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendments made:—Page 4, leave out—

"(d.) "That the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses are excessive."

Line 8, to insert after the words "that is to say," the words—

"That the alleged street is not a street within the meaning of this Act," and "that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable, or that the estimated expenses are excessive."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Hearing and determination of objections).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): I do not propose to move any Amendment of this clause, but simply wish to call the attention of the Committee to the two different appeals proposed in the Bill. There is an appeal to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and there is an appeal to the Local Government Board. My impression is that the appeal to the Local Government Board is one to which all the aggrieved parties are likely to resort. I do not think any one will go to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction; and I should have thought it would have been best to provide for an appeal to the Local Government Board only. The Committee need not be afraid that if that course were taken great expense would be thrown on the country; because there is provision in the Bill for raising the costs from the owner. Even if an increase to the Inspector's staff of the Local Government Board were necessitated under this Bill, there would be no extra charge to the country. I do not know whether my hon. Friend for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) has considered the matter; but if he has not, I hope he will do so before Report.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): There may be cases in which both parties are quite ready to take the opinion of the magistrate in the locality. It would be a pity, therefore, to exclude a Court which is sitting at your own door, and compel the parties to resort to an appeal to the Local Government Board, however trivial the question in dispute may be. I think it is better to have two strings to our bow. The retention of this provision can do no harm; but it is easy to conceive cases in which it would probably be a great convenience and a saving of expense to resort to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I agree with the hon. Member (Mr. Dodds) that it is too much to refer all cases, no matter how trivial, to the Local Government Board.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Personally, I am disposed to accept the suggestion of my hon. Friend (Mr. Dodds) that we should leave the clause as it is; but I hope the President of the Local Government Board will promise us that the Local Government Board will not assume that the intention of Parliament was that the matter should go to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. There is just the danger in providing the two appeals that the Local Government Board will say—"Parliament meant you to go to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction before you come to us." I hope the Local Government Board will be willing, through their Inspectors, to act in all cases in which the parties desire they should.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): I think that under Sub-section (2) the Local Government Board would have no option in the matter.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: What I was afraid of was that the Local Government Board might consider that they have power to insist that certain legal points should be settled by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction before the parties came to the Board.

MR. STANSFELD: The words of the sub-section are—"Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, the sanitary authority may, before any application is made to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and if before the expiration of the period for objections they are so required in writing by a majority of the persons making an objection, or by a person entitled to object alone, shall refer to the Local Government Board all such objections, and that Board, after such local or other inquiry as they see fit, may make such order in the matter as to them may seem equitable."

Mr. Dodds

I do not think the Local Government Board could refuse.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Final apportionment of expenses).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): I propose to omit the word "expended," in page 7, line 2, and to insert "borrowed," and then to move the omission of the words—

"From the respective dates of payment of such moneys until such completion."

Local Authorities are not able to borrow all the money they want for these matters, in the small sums in which they are obliged to pay the money. A case in point came before me when I was at the Local Government Board. The Chiswick Authorities had to raise a total sum of £15,000. They could only raise it in amounts of £5,000, while they only had to pay £1,000 at a time. A certain loss in interest would fall on the rates, if we carried this section in the form in which it stands. I admit this clause does away with nine-tenths of the grievance Local Authorities have at the present time, though it leaves a small portion of the grievance untouched. If the Committee accepts this Amendment, and then omits the words from "from" to "completion," we shall at once get rid of the last vestige of the grievance, and I cannot but think it is well to remove all the hardship.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 2, to leave out the word "expended," and insert the word "borrowed."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'expended' stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I labour under a great disadvantage in not being able to follow the Amendment suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, those Amendments not appearing on the Paper. But upon the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that nine-tenths of the difficulty under which Local Authorities labour will be met by my clause, I am content to take it in its present form.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I think it would be well to take the clause as it stands.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I am sorry I cannot recognize the improvement suggested by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke). The clause will protect the Sanitary Authority if they spend the money before they have borrowed it, and that seems to me to meet the difficulty far better than the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (Time of payment, charge on premises, and recovery of sum due for expenses).

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): I beg to propose to leave out "within," in line 38, and insert "at the expiration of." The words of the clause are—

"And shall be payable to such authority within one month after payment of such principal sum has been demanded."

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 38, to leave out the word "within," and insert the words "at the expiration of."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE Chelsea: The clause provides that the payment of the principal sums due shall be spread over a period not exceeding 20 years from the date of the final apportionment. I propose to omit the word "twenty," and to insert in its place either "ten" or "twelve." "Twenty years" has been adopted by the Bill, instead of "thirty years," as at the present time. Thirty years has always been felt to be preposterously long, and I cannot but think that 20 years is too long. The works contemplated could not last for 20 years. Ten or 12 years is the outside period the works will last. I think it is improper, even as a maximum, to put in so long as 20 years. I should like to have the opinion of my hon. Friend Mr. Dodds on the point.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 14, to leave out the word "twenty," in order to insert the word "ten."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the clause."

MR. DODDS Stockton: I regret my right hon. Friend has taken objection to this reduced period. I do not at all agree with him that works of sewage will not last for a considerably longer period than 20 years. If you saddle the present generation with too heavy a burden, by making it repay the money borrowed within a very short period, the result very often is that very necessary work is not done, and money is not borrowed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): Section 8 requires that—

"The said register shall be kept in accordance with such regulations as the sanitary authority may from time to time make, with the approval of the Local Government Board, and shall be admissible in evidence, on its mere production from the custody of such authority."

I propose to add after "Board" the words—

"Or in accordance with any general regulations from time to time made by that Board."

It is convenient that for certain cases there should be this provision.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 17, after the word "Board," to insert the words "or in accordance with any general regulations from time to time made by that Board."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Recovery of expenses summarily or by action).

MR. WESTLAKE Essex, Romford: The Amendment which stands in my name is intended to make the cost of street improvements repayable by the owners at an earlier stage of the proceedings. The provision contained in the Amendment exists extensively; it exists in the Metropolis by virtue of Public Acts, and has been sanctioned by various Local Acts for a number of Local Boards; and it has been found so satisfactory in its working that I have been requested by the Local Boards of East Ham and Barking, which have had the opportunity of observing its usefulness under the neighbouring Local Board of West Ham, which is one of those that possess it, to move its insertion in this Bill. The purport of the Amendment is that the expenses shall be recoverable in advance. It has been found that, where the power exists, the expenses are much more freely paid in advance. The owners know that upon the payment of the expenses depends the chance of the Local Board being willing to take over the streets and make the improvements. If the work is done before they are made to pay, they are by no means as ready to pay as they were when they came to the Local Board to make the request. The Local Board are obliged to institute law suits, and heavy expenses are incurred. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 26, to leave out from "(1)," to end of line 34, and insert—"At any time after the expiration of the two months mentioned in section three, or if any objection affecting the premises in question has been made under section four, then, at any time after the matter of such objection shall have been determined, the sanitary authority, in addition and without prejudice to any remedy under the other provisions of this Act, and whether before the private street works in question have been commenced, or during their progress, or after their completion, may from time to time recover from the owner or owners for the time being of any premises included in the provisional or final apportionment, either as a civil debt in a court of summary jurisdiction for the county or place in which the premises are wholly or partly situate, or as a simple contract debt by action in any court, the sum, if any, charged under this Act on such premises in respect of the expenses of such private street works, or, if no such sum has so become charged, the sum provisionally apportioned on such premises in respect of such works, which last-mentioned sum, being so recovered, together with a corresponding portion of the interest mentioned in section ten, sub-section (1), shall be reckoned in diminution of the amount to be charged on the said premises under this Act; and, in case the amount otherwise to be charged on the said premises under this Act shall be less than that provisionally apportioned on them, and recovered as aforesaid, the sanitary authority shall repay the difference to the owner from whom the last-mentioned sum was recovered."—(Mr. Westlake.)

MR. DODDS (Stockton): This seems to be an attempt to incorporate upon the system of the Public Health Act, which is in operation in the country generally, the Metropolitan system, which is different in important particulars. In the next place, I think it would be exceedingly hard upon the owners of property, many of whom have sufficient difficulty in finding money after improvements, to compel them to pay beforehand for the work that it is intended to do. It is now the practice of the Local Board with which I am connected to allow the owners of property to make application to extend the time of payment by two or three years, according to the circumstances, the owners of the property paying interest on the various instalments. As this is the first charge on the property, there can be no loss if ordinary precautions are taken. I must, therefore, oppose the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 (Exemption from expenses of incumbent of church, &c.)

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottingham): Clause 13 limits the exemption to cases in which there is a building for the purpose of worship. There are cases where land has been purchased with the view of erecting a place of worship upon it, and my Amendment is to give to the owners of such land the benefit of this exemption. It may be objected that the land may never be used for the purpose for which it was purchased, and that exemption may be improperly granted. I propose to meet such a case, by limiting the exemption to land which can be used only for that purpose.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 3, after the word "poor," to insert the words "or the trustees to whom has been conveyed land for the exclusive purpose of erecting thereon any place of public worship."—(Mr. Carvell Williams.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): Is the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Carvell Williams) aware what the effect of this Amendment would be in law? It is a very common thing that trustees have the power to sell at any time. There was a case at Usedale Road quite recently in which land was bought by trustees of a chapel for the purpose of erecting a chapel. A new street has been made through the land, and the trustees have contributed their share to that new street. Since that they have sold the land for other purposes, and the chapel is to go to Fulham. This is a case, I think, to which this Amendment would apply. Of course, there are, too, a great number of cases in which chapels have ceased to be used as places of public worship.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I have already explained privately to my hon. Friend who moved this Amendment the reason why I cannot adopt it. I should say, in the first place, that the clause has been already amended so as to meet the principal objection my hon. Friend had to it as it stands in the Public Health Act, which is limited exclusively to ministers, and not extended to property vested in trustees. I know of two cases in my experience in which land bought for places of worship has been put to other uses. In one case in Middlesborough land was bought for a parsonage house. The ground, however, became so valuable for building purposes that it was sold, and a number of public-houses built on it. In Stockton, within the past 12 months, a plot of ground of considerable size was given by a gentleman as a site for a church and school, and other buildings connected with them. The land around was let for building purposes, and streets were formed. What happened? A chapel was built on part of the property and a school upon another portion, and upon the remaining part of the property a row of very nice dwellings have been built during the past six months, which get the full benefit of all the paving around the site without any charge whatever. For these reasons, as well as for others which I have mentioned to my hon. Friend, I regret that I cannot accept the Amendment. I have given him a great deal, and now he asks for more.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I could mention three cases similar to those mentioned by my hon. Friend.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottingham, S.): I venture to say that the cases mentioned by the hon. Member Mr. Dodds, would not be covered by these words, because I apprehend that the land in these cases was not conveyed for the purpose of erecting places of worship and for no other purpose. The case I have in mind is one in which it would be impossible to devote the land to any other purpose.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): The Amendment would involve an inquiry into the title of every piece of land.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottingham, S.): The hon. Member (Mr. Dodds) who has charge of this Bill has undoubtedly cured a defect in the existing law, by inserting the words "or trustee" in the first line of Clause 13. By a recent decision doubt was created as to the applicability of the exemption to cases where there was neither incumbent or a minister. That doubt will be removed by this Bill if it should pass; but what I ask for is that the parties in pending cases should be put in the same position as those who will come under the Bill. I wish to give the benefit of the Bill to those who have suffered as a result of a quite recent decision.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, at end insert—" (2.) Section one hundred and fifty-one of the principal Act shall read as if, in the first line thereof, the words 'the incumbent, minister, or trustee,' had been inserted, instead of the words 'the incumbent or minister,' and, as so altered, shall apply as well in all cases where notices or orders have been already given or made, or works executed, or shall hereafter be given or made or executed."—(Mr. Carvell Williams.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) Halifax: Section 151 is already repealed.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: That being the case, I shall raise the question in another form on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 14 to 16 agreed to.

Clause 17 (Application of sums received from owners, &c.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) Halifax: I beg to move to insert after "may," in line 11, "subject to such conditions as they may deem necessary."

On Motion of The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD Mr. Stansfeld (Halifax), the following Amendment made:—Page 11, line 14, after

"may," insert "subject to such conditions as they may deem necessary."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 18 (Power to borrow for private street works fund).

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): I propose the omission of this clause, and also of Clause 19. My reason is simply this—the object of these clauses is to enable the Sanitary Authority to set aside excess of repayments for objects other than those contemplated by the scheme. We gave that power in the 17th clause, subject to the assent of the Local Government Board.

Clause negatived.

Clause 19 (Annual return to Local Government Board) negatived.

Clause 20 (Adoption of private streets).

On Motion of Mr. DODDS, the following Amendment made:—Page 12, line 13, after the first "authority," insert "either before or after the passing of this Act."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 (Application of Act to part of a street).

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 40, to leave out from "the part not so repairable to expenses," in line 4, page 13, inclusive, and insert—"This Act shall apply to the whole street as if no part of the street were repairable by the inhabitants at large: Provided, That where any expenses are incurred under this Act in respect of the street, a proper proportion of such expenses, having regard to the part of the street which is repairable by the inhabitants at large, shall be charged upon such inhabitants and paid as other expenses of such repair are paid, and the authority paying these expenses, where not the sanitary authority, shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be an owner of premises charged with expenses of private street works."
—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

MR. DODDS (Stockton): In my opinion, and in the opinion of those who have taken very considerable interest in this matter, the clause as it stands in the Bill is preferable to the amended form suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. Under the circumstances, however, I feel I have no alternative but to submit to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

On Motion of The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Stansfeld) (Halifax), the following Amendments made:—Page 13, line 26, after "any," insert "Sanitary authority resolve to execute any;" line 26, leave out "are executed."

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I have the following Amendment on the Paper:—Page 10, after Clause 12, insert the following Clause:—

"The owners or proprietors of any canal or navigable river shall not be liable in any expenses of private street works under this Act, in respect of any land or premises of such owners or proprietors which shall be used solely as a part of their line of canal or navigation or towing path hereof, and shall have no communication with the street in connection with which such expenses are incurred."

I do not propose to move this, but propose to give way to the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Jackson), because his clause is more complete. It applies to railways as well as canals. The purport of the clause is very simple, and I think it is also just as well as simple. There are cases in connection with both railways and canals where there is a road or passage belonging to the Company not accessible from the public highways. It is especially the case in regard to canals; and we propose that where there is a towing-path or a passage of that kind the Company shall not be liable for the expenses under the Act, provided there be no communication with the public street. If, however, the communication be established at some future time, then liability would arise. My hon. Friend below me will bear me out, I think, that this has been introduced into a Local Act this year. I think it is a just provision. It is hard on Companies that they should have to pay expenses in respect of that from which they derive no advantage whatever. I will move the clause in the name of my hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, after Clause 13, to insert the following Clause:—

(Exemption of premises of Railway or Canal Company having no communication with street.)

"No Railway or Canal Company shall be liable to any expenses under this Act in respect of any of their premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on any street, if such premises are used solely for the purposes of their Railway or Canal undertaking, and have no communication with such street, but in the event of a communication being made with such street at any time after the expenses of any private street works in respect thereof shall have been apportioned under this Act, the Railway or Canal Company making such communication shall pay to the sanitary authority the amount which, but for the provisions of this section, they would, in the first instance, have been liable to pay, and the sanitary authority shall divide such amount among the owners for the time being of the other premises, according to the proportions in which the original expenses were divided amongst them in the final apportionment made under this Act,—(Mr. F. S. Powell.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I regret that I cannot accept this clause; and I venture to suggest to the Committee that there is no absolute necessity for it. It would not be fair to exempt either railways or canals from contribution. Clause 7 already contemplates the consideration of the degree of benefit derived by the premises from the works carried out. The question will be the amount of any benefit derived, so that any Railway Company will have the right to say—“Our property is very slightly benefited; therefore we object to have any of the apportionment put on us, or, at any rate, none but a nominal amount.” I know a case at the present moment where a Railway Company purchased land for a siding. Stipulations were made that they should not have access to a road that it was intended to make, but should have means of exit from and access to their platform at two particular points agreed upon on two public roads. Well, very recently, within the past few months—during the present year, in fact—the Company have altered their plans; and now that a roadway adjoining the railway has been formed and dedicated to the use of the public, they have placed three gateways in the fence by the side of the road, and they will derive as much benefit from the road as people on the opposite side of the street, who had to contribute to the expenses. I submit that Clause 7 provides adequate relief for Railway Companies, and to omit to charge them altogether would be an injustice to the owners of other property on the estate, especially as many circumstances may arise to render the land that now forms the site of the railways, or may hereafter form the site of the railways, available for other purposes. We had an instance of that in the conversion of Regent's Canal into railways. I think Clause 7 deals adequately with the case of railways and canals.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I think there is something in what the hon. Gentleman says as to the alternative contained in Clause 7. But I would point out that that clause gives an extraordinarily large discretion to the Sanitary Authority. It will not lay them under the necessity of considering whether any reduction can be made, but will leave it to their sense of justice whether or not they shall consider what justice is.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): There is an appeal from their decision.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): If the hon. Member will refer to Clause 4, Sub-section (c), he will find the following ground for objecting to the proposal of a Sanitary Authority:—

“That certain premises ought to be excluded from or included in the provisional apportionment.”

That, I think, entirely meets the case.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I withdraw the Amendment. I have raised the point, and I must remain content with that.

COLONEL E. HUGHES (Woolwich): The effect of this clause would be that possibly the owners on one side of a street might have to pay for the paving on both sides. If the clause were limited to streets made after the canal, perhaps it would be right; but with regard to streets made, though not paved, before the canal was made, I think it should not apply. The Companies ought to bear burdens that may possibly fall on the land they take.

Question put, and negatived.

CAPTAIN COTTON (Cheshire, Wirral): The new clause I rise to propose was the subject of an Instruction before the Bill went into Committee. It repeals Clause 156 of the Public Health Act of 1875, by which it was enacted that it shall not be lawful in any urban district to bring forward any house or building forming part of any street. I have used the words "to erect or bring forward" so as to make the clause apply to new as well as to existing buildings. This has been found necessary on account of certain decisions that have been given on the subject by the Law Courts. I may add that I looked into the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, and that, so far as I can make out, this clause is fully provided for in that measure.

Amendment proposed, after Clause 22, to insert the following Clause:—

(Buildings not to be brought forward.)

"Section one hundred and fifty-six of 'The Public Health Act, 1875,' is, save as hereinafter mentioned, hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted that it shall not be lawful in any urban district, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street, or any part of any such house or building, beyond the main front wall of the house or building on either side thereof, nor to build any addition to any house or building beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side of the same.

"Any person offending against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice in this behalf from the urban authority.

"Provided, That the repeal by this section enacted shall not affect anything duly done or suffered, or any right or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred, or any security given under the section hereby repealed, or any penalty, forfeiture, or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against such section, or any investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy in respect of any such right, liability, security, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment, as aforesaid; and any such investigation, legal proceeding, and remedy may be carried on as if this Act had not been passed,"—(Captain Cotton),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): It may save time if I at once state that I shall be happy to accept the clause, which will be a great improvement in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea): Would the Government undertake to consider whether a new clause could not be brought up to deal with what is a very hard case indeed? At the present moment, if a scheme is prepared for the laying out of a new district in which there are a great number of new streets—sometimes as many as 20 or 30 being dealt with at once—the expense of laying down a new sewer may be charged to one particular street. The sewer may have been laid down for the benefit of the whole of the streets, and not for one only. The point is a technical one that ought, I think, to be dealt with by the promoters of the Bill.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): That point is dealt with in the power which is given to deal with adjoining property.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not think the point is dealt with. You might throw the whole expense of several streets on one street. You can throw a portion of the expense on the whole district for which the authority serves, no doubt.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I do not think that the clause the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wigan refers to could be understood to meet the case mentioned without a great deal of straining. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) will give us an undertaking to consider the point raised by the right hon. Baronet.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I should be glad to consider the point. If the right hon. Gentleman would prepare a sketch clause of the matter in his mind, and would send it to me, I should be happy to give it every consideration. If I am to give an opinion upon it upon Report, it would be a great convenience to me to have the suggestion put into writing, and sent to me in the course of the present week. I propose to take the Report stage some time next week, so that I think, in the interest of expedition, it will be well to follow the course I point out.

Amendment proposed, in Schedule, page 16, line 25, to leave out the word "can."—(Mr. Stansfeld).

Amendment agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): I beg to propose the Amendment on the Paper relating to the Schedule after line 28. The second part of the Schedule defines the notices to be given, and it does not appear to me to be sufficient. I propose that the notice, or a copy of it, shall be served on every owner or person in occupation of the premises, and, where there is no one on the premises, that it shall be posted up on some conspicuous part of them. I also provide for the notice being sent by post. It appears to me that my proposal will materially improve the Bill and the law on this subject.

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule, page 16, after line 28, insert—
 “Any notice required by this Act to be given shall be served on every owner affected thereby by delivering the same, or a true copy thereof, to him, or at his residence, or to some person on the premises in respect of which the notice is given, or, where there is no person on the premises who can be so served, by fixing the same on some conspicuous part of the premises. It may also be served by post by a prepaid letter addressed to the owner at his last known or most usual place of abode, or at the premises, and, if served by post, shall be deemed to have been served at the time when the letter containing the notice would be delivered in the ordinary course of post, and, in proving such service, it shall be sufficient to prove that the notice was properly addressed and put into the post.

“Any notice required to be given to the owner of any premises may be addressed by the description of the ‘owner’ of the premises naming them in respect of which the notice is given, without further name or description.”—(Mr. Stanfeld.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. DODDS Stockton : I do not at all like this clause, and, objectionable as it is to me, it is still more so to friends associated with me in this matter. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman who has moved it will promise between this and Report to consider the matter fully in the light of representations that will be made to him, I will not resist the introduction of the Amendment.

MR. F. S. POWELL Wigan : May I be allowed to say a concluding word? I hope the Committee will sanction the insertion of these words. I do not think the Schedule as it stands in the Bill is at all sufficient. The Bill may involve the payment of a considerable sum on these expenses—a sum which, if not considerable in itself, will be found considerable when you consider the position of the owners, many of whom will be, comparatively speaking, poor persons. It appears to me that the notice which would have to be given under Part II. of the Schedule, as it stands, would be very insufficient. The Schedule says the notice shall be—

“publicly posted in or near the street to which it relates once at least in each of three successive weeks.”

Such publication cannot be sufficient, for the notice may be destroyed by a shower of rain, or pulled down by a mischievous child.

MR. JOHNS (Warwick, Nuneaton) : I would suggest that the notice should be required to be sent in a registered letter, instead of an ordinary prepaid letter

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Stanfeld), the following Amendments made:—
 Schedule, page 16, line 29, leave out “shall,” and insert “may also;” page 17, line 2, leave out from “and such publication” to “in such street,” in line 4; leave out from line 10 to line 12, inclusive, and insert—

“Where several notices are given in respect of the same works, and are not given on the same day, the date of the giving of the last of such notices shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be the date of the giving of all of them.”

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That the Chairman report the Bill, as amended, to the House.”

MR. STUART-WORTLEY Sheffield, Hallam : I should like to know whether, between this and the next stage, there will be time for the Bill to be reprinted?

MR. DODDS Stockton : Yes; I will take care that it is reprinted.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday 3rd June, and to be printed. [Bill 230.]

PRIVATE BILLS (STANDING ORDER No. 128).

Report from the Select Committee considered.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL), on rising to move that Standing Order 128, which provided that no interest out of capital should be paid on calls under Railway Bills be vacated, and that a new Standing Order recommended by the Select Committee be adopted in lieu thereof, said, it would be in their Lordships' recollection that a short time ago a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the Standing Orders of that House with regard to Railway Bills, prohibiting the payment of interest or dividend out of capital during the construction of works. That Committee was appointed to consider whether any alterations ought to be made in the Standing Order of their Lordships' House, having in view the fact that the Standing Order of the House of Commons, which was formerly the same as that of their Lordships' House, had been two years ago altered very materially, and also seeing that on more than one occasion their Lordships had thought fit to dispense with their Standing Order in its existing form. The Select Committee took the matter into their consideration, and were unanimous in the Report which they presented to their Lordships' House, although certain differences of opinion were no doubt entertained by Members of the Committee as to the extent to which it was expedient or justifiable that a Bill should authorize the execution of railway or other works and sanction the payment of interest out of capital during construction. But it was felt that the matter could not be left in its present very unsatisfactory position, because while the House of Commons allowed, under certain somewhat stringent regulations, the insertion of a clause sanctioning such payment of interest out of capital during construction, their Lordships' House, by Standing Order 128, absolutely prohibited it. The result of this was that a measure containing such a clause could pass through the other House; and in one case, at least, their Lordships suspended their Standing Order, and permitted the insertion of the clause as sanctioned by the House of Commons. The Select Committee had thought it better to recommend that substantially the Standing Order of their Lordships' House should be the same as that of the House of Commons; and therefore they had recommended only certain verbal alterations in that Standing Order, which, in their opinion, made its object and purpose somewhat more clear in an important particular, and also one or two alterations in form rather than substance, which were necessary to bring it more into conformity with the proceedings in their Lordships' House. Substantially, what he asked them to adopt was the Standing Order, which two years ago was adopted by the House of Commons. Everyone must be agreed that where an undertaking was secured by statute with the permission to those who were to execute the works to pay interest during the time of construction out of capital and not out of earnings, it was extremely important that those who were induced to invest their money in the undertaking should have clear and distinct notice of what was being done; and, provided that they had such notice, he thought it would not probably be considered necessary, at all events in all cases, that the care of the Legislature over them should go further than that. The Standing Order of the House of Commons was stringent with regard to the interest to be allowed, the time during which it was to be allowed, when it was to begin, and the conditions of subscription of capital under which a loan was to be allowed. In the Standing Order now recommended to their Lordships it was made perfectly clear that the notice of a Company having power so to pay interest must be given in every prospectus, advertisement, or other document of the Company inviting subscriptions for shares and in every certificate of shares. The Select Committee were unanimous in the conclusion at which they arrived that a provision of that sort might be recommended to their Lordships' House with a substantial feeling of security against any injustice or wrong being done. Of course, to a very great extent, people must take care of and protect themselves; but when an Act of Parliament was required it might reasonably be maintained that some further protection might be inserted for the benefit of the unwary and those who were wanting in caution. He thought that if they secured that in every case the document which invited them to part with their money should at the same time make known to them exactly what was being done in the matter of paying interest out of capital during construction, beyond that people might be left to take care of themselves. The Select Committee were satisfied that there was substantial ground for altering the Standing Order of their Lordships' House, inasmuch as it was thought by most of the Members that unless a provision of this sort were adopted undertakings of a perfectly substantial and legitimate character would not, and could not, be carried out, because money which would be subscribed with such a provision would not be subscribed without it. A provision of this sort was not required to bolster up unsound and speculative concerns, but might be legitimately introduced in the case of sound and substantial ones. It was most undesirable upon a matter of this kind, unless there was some extremely strong reason for it, that there should be a difference between the Standing Order of their Lordships' House and the Standing Order of the House of Commons. It did occur to the Committee that in some respects, perhaps, changes might be desirable; but they thought it would be better in the meantime to pass the Standing Order in the form in which the House of Commons adopted it, and, should further amendment prove desirable, the matter should be made the subject of a communication between their Lordships' House and the House of Commons, so that the Standing Orders of both Houses upon this matter might ultimately be the same.

Moved, "That Standing Order No. 128 be vacated, and that the following Standing Order be adopted in lieu thereof:

"A clause shall be inserted in every Railway Bill prohibiting the payment of any interest or dividend out of any capital which the Company have been or may be authorised to raise, either by means of calls, or of any power of borrowing, to any shareholder on the amount of the calls made in respect of the shares held by him, except such interest on money advanced by any shareholder beyond the amount of the calls actually made as is in conformity with the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, as the case may be; and except such interest (if any) as the Committee on the Bill may, according to the circumstances of the case, think fit to allow, subject always to the following conditions:-

- (1.) That the rate of interest allowed by the Committee do not in any case exceed four per centum per annum;
- (2.) That interest be allowed to be paid in respect only of the time allowed by the Bill for the completion of the railway, or such less time as the Committee think fit;
- (3.) That payment of interest be not allowed to begin until the Railway Company have obtained a certificate of the Board of Trade to the effect that two-thirds at least of the share capital authorised by the Bill, in respect whereof interest may be paid, have been actually issued and accepted, and are held by shareholders, who, or whose executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, are legally liable for the same;
- (4.) That interest do not accrue in favour of any shareholder for any time during which any call on any of his shares is in arrear;
- (5.) That the aggregate amount to be so paid for interest be estimated and stated in the Bill, and be not deemed capital within Standing Order 112;
- (6.) That notice of the Company having power so to pay interest out of capital be given in every prospectus, advertisement, or other document of the Company inviting subscriptions for shares, and in every certificate of shares; and
- (7.) That the half-yearly accounts of the Company do show the amount on which, and the rate at which, interest has been paid:

And the Company shall be authorised by the Bill to pay interest accordingly, but not further or otherwise.

"If in any case the Committee on the Bill do not think fit to allow any such interest, then there shall be inserted in the Bill provisions making liable to penalties, recoverable summarily, any director or officer of the Company who shall, directly or indirectly, pay or procure to be paid any interest or dividend prohibited as aforesaid, and making illegal and void any contract entered into by the Company, or the directors thereof, or any of them, under which payment of any interest or dividend prohibited as aforesaid shall be, directly or indirectly, provided for.

"No Railway Bill authorising the payment of interest out of capital shall be read a second time until a report thereon from the Board of Trade has been laid upon the Table of the House."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he had always been of opinion that the principle of their Lordships' Standing Order was a very sound one. He felt the force, however, of what was said by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack as to the great necessity for something like unanimity of action upon this subject between the two Houses of Parliament. He would not oppose the Motion, although he continued to think that the Standing Order of their Lordships' House was better than that of the other House.

Motion agreed to; and resolved accordingly.

The said Standing Order to be printed. (No. 126.)

CROFTERS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

(NO. 95.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

I.—Security of Tenure.

Clause 1 (A crofter shall not be removed except for breach of statutory conditions).

LORD LOVAT, in moving, in line 12, before Sub-section 1, to insert a new sub-section—namely—

"A crofter shall reside on his holding unless serving with an embodied regiment of Militia," said, it was desirable that the crofter should continue to reside on his holding. As the Bill stood, he did not see anything to prevent a crofter fencing his croft round, planting it with trees or anything else he chooses, going off to America, and returning after 20 years, and coming down upon the proprietor for payment for any improvements. The object of the Bill was not to do that, but to provide land for the crofter; and, therefore, he moved this Amendment, so as to secure that the crofter should reside on his holding.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, after line 12, before sub-section (1.), insert as a new sub-section—" (1.) The crofter shall reside on his holding unless serving with an embodied regiment of Militia."—(The Lord Lovat.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he thought an Amendment which he had put down would meet the object of his noble Friend better. He intended to propose that the definition of a crofter should be a person who resided habitually on his holding.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, that there were many cases of men who had to leave their crofts and serve with the Army, and who might be away for a year or a year and a-half. While he was away his croft might be taken care of by his wife or his mother, and it would be hard to deprive him of it in these circumstances. He might be absent, and yet the croft suffer no damage, and there might be a bond fide intention on his part to come back.

In reply to Lord ABINGER,

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, that the case he had put was not at all an unusual one. It certainly was a very ordinary case in past times, when hundreds of crofters returned from military service and resumed agricultural operations on their crofts. He would be more inclined to accept the suggestion of the noble Duke to insert the word "habitually" than to accept the noble Lord's Amendment.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Earl of DALHOUSIE) said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. Enough had been said already to show that it was an objectionable Amendment; but it was even more objectionable than had been shown, for crofters often went to the fishings, and even worked for a while on the large farms. If the Amendment were accepted, he was not sure that it would not seriously affect the value of the Bill.

LORD LOVAT said, he was quite ready to accept the suggestion of the noble Duke to insert the word "habitually" in the Definition Clause and withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD ABINGER moved, as an additional sub-section, to insert—

"The crofter shall have been convicted of felony, or theft, or be in receipt of parochial relief."

While he regretted that legislation such as this had been proposed, he thought they should endeavour to make it as innocuous as possible. It put the interests of the landlords on one side and the interests of the crofters on the other. Now, while he might admit that there were ruthless landlords, yet, on the other hand, they had sometimes worthless tenants; and the privileges of the Bill should not be, in his opinion, extended to convicted felons and thieves, or to crofters who were in receipt of parochial relief. He had been for 25 years Chairman of the Board of one of the largest parishes, and he found that the old feeling of independence was very much wearing off, and that many were on the poor roll who ought not to have been there. Under the circumstances which would be introduced by the power of bequest contained in the Bill, the landlord ought to have some power over crofts held by persons in receipt of parochial relief.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 16, after ("tenancy") insert as a new sub-section—"The crofter shall have been convicted of felony, or theft, or be in receipt of parochial relief."—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he hoped his noble Friend would not press his Amendment. He did not think it would have any practical value, while it had an exceedingly offensive aspect. He could sincerely say that among the crofting population in the West of Scotland ordinary crime, such as was here referred to, was almost unknown, and he did not remember the case of any crofter being convicted of theft or felony. It was offensive to apply it to them when it did not apply to the larger class of farmers, who were not deprived of their farms by law on conviction for theft. As to those receiving parochial relief, he had never heard of a man being admitted to be a pauper in his district who had got a croft. The ratepayers looked after that. There might be cases in which a crofter became bankrupt, and his cattle and goods sold off. He might then become a pauper; but if he came upon the roll he could not retain his holding. The Bill would really gain nothing by the Amendment.

LORD ABINGER said, he had no intention of proposing anything offensive. As there was so little likelihood of his Amendment being enforced, there could be little objection to its being inserted.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he did not understand the point of the Amendment. If the crofter did not pay his rent, he could, under Sub-section 1 of this clause, cease to be in possession of his croft.

LORD ABINGER maintained that a difficulty might arise in this way in connection with the Bequest Clause. If a man became a pauper he did not pay his rent; but if he had not paid for two years he had to get six months' notice. If he died in the interval his son might come in and get the croft, and the landlord would have no claim against him for the past rent. The object of the Amendment was to give the landlord power to take over the holding on the crofter taking parochial relief.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he agreed with the remarks of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), and would even go further. He asked their Lordships to consider whether there was not a moral question involved here? The noble Lord (Lord Abinger) proposed that when a man was convicted of an offence, not only he should be removed from his croft, but his family should also be made to suffer, and they must all remove somewhere else. The man might go to a town, and become worse there and increase its criminal population. It seemed to him a more rational thing that every parish should consume its own vice and crime, and not be so solicitous to send its crime to other parts of the country. Then in regard to the point of parochial relief. Under the Bill the smallest occupier paying the smallest rent became a crofter; and they could easily conceive circumstances in which an old man or an old woman should be in temporary distress and receive outdoor relief. Would it not be a gross act of cruelty if they were to sanction the summary expulsion of such old persons from the holding to which they were warmly attached? On the whole, he regarded the Amendment as very pernicious in its tendency, and he hoped their Lordships would not agree to it.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he would be very sorry if their Lordships assented to this Amendment, and he would suggest a difficulty. There was no such crime known in Scotch law as felony. It therefore would be easy to pass the Amendment to that extent, because it would be inoperative but for the other considerations. He thought it would be a very ungracious act if they should put in such words as were proposed. He concurred with the appeal of the noble Earl the Secretary for Scotland, who on the second reading said that the Bill should be discussed with every desire to ameliorate the condition of the crofters. In that spirit he thought the words now suggested were unnecessary, and therefore he could not support them.

LORD ABINGER said, he proposed to amend the 4th sub-section of Section 1, which provided that the crofter should not, without the consent of his landlord in writing, sub-divide or sub-let his holding, by inserting the words "or permit any other family to reside in the same house."

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 25, after ("thereof") insert ("or permit any other family to reside in the same house.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he could not accept the Amendment, which he thought was too dictatorial.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, there were, no doubt, many cases in which parents took in the families of their sons into very small houses; and sometimes, even in cases of sickness and death, scenes very shocking to decency occurred. They had several examples of this before the Royal Commission. If the noble Lord would insert the word "habitually" he should feel inclined to support the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that no doubt the Amendment was pointed against what was a real evil in the Western Highlands, where there was great overcrowding in the cottages. He had found it almost impossible to prevent it, and such a provision as that proposed seemed rather to belong to the class of Bills which dealt with sanitary questions than with Bills dealing with questions of tenure. He had no doubt that Parliament would adopt further and more stringent measures with regard to the health of the people; and if Local Bodies were ever intrusted with such duties they would take cognizance of this great evil. It was a difficult and invidious duty to cast out a crofter because he admitted his son's wife. The crofters did not take in crofters, but allowed their married children to come in and overcrowd the house. He thought that was an evil which they must put up with for the present, and wait for the progress of education and local government.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved, as an Amendment, to add the following new sub-section:—

"The crofter shall not persistently violate any written condition for the protection of the landlord's interest or the interest of the neighbouring crofters which is legally applicable to the holding, and which shall be sanctioned as reasonable by the Land Commissioners."

The object of the Amendment was to prevent the abuse of rights by one man to the disadvantage of his landlord and his neighbours. As the Bill came up to this House there was no possibility of getting rid of a crofter unless he did not pay rent. But there might be a whole string of regulations which the crofter had signed as conditions of keeping his holding, and he might evade every one of them. Some of these stipulations were in the interest not of the landlords, but of the neighbouring crofters. It was common to put in conditions as to the amount of cattle to be on the common grazing, and there was no more common cause of quarrel than when one man of strong will, perhaps not with the highest character, put on more cattle than his own share on the common grazing. Sometimes this one man overruled the rest of the crofters. In order to present this state of things the landlord often inserted a provision that the crofter should keep his cattle to the proper limit. He knew one case, he was sorry to say, where a minister of the Church of Scotland who had a right of grazing put many more cattle on the common grazing ground than he had a right to do. He understood that the Government were prepared to accept the Amendment if words were inserted to show that the agreement had actually been signed by the crofter. He was willing to accept the proposal of the Government, although such matters were very often simply customary obligations. However, he admitted that there was some difficulty, and he was quite willing to limit his Amendment to the case where the crofters had actually signed the conditions.

Amendment moved.

In page 1, line 27, after sub-section 4, insert as a new sub-section—"The crofter shall not persistently violate any written condition for the protection of the landlord's interest or the interest of neighbouring crofters which is legally applicable to the holding, and which shall be sanctioned as reasonable by the Land Commission."—The Duke of Argyll.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he would accept the Amendment, subject to the limitation suggested by the noble Duke.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD ABINGER begged to move an Amendment to give the landlord power to enter a holding for the purpose of taking "limestone," in addition to stone, marble, &c., already provided for.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 12, after "stone," insert ("limestone.")—The Lord Abinger.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE considered the introduction of the word "limestone" was unnecessary.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON believed that limestone was stone.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, sub-section 6, line 20, leave out "sea," and after ("shore," insert "of the sea, lakes, or rivers."—(The Lord Lovat.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he had no objection to the addition of the words, although it was not always easy to draw the line between the shore of the sea, or a river, or a lake.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought his noble Friend might safely accept the Amendment. In some parts of Scotland there were immense lakes, 20 or 30 miles long, to which such a provision as this ought obviously to apply. The extension was of no importance as against the interest of the landlord, although its use to the landlord would be considerable.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD LOVAT moved to enable the landlord to take "wild birds or vermin," as well as game and fish. This provision was principally directed against wood-pigeons.

Amendment moved, in line 25, after "fish," add "wild birds or vermin."—The Lord Lovat.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD LOVAT moved to add the following new sub-section:—

"The crofter shall be subject to removal at the first term after six months' notice if convicted of smuggling spirits or allowing smuggling on his holding, or if convicted of felony, or if twice convicted of poaching."

He considered it was highly important in the interests of the crofter as well as the whole neighbourhood that smuggling should be discouraged.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, after sub-section (7., add as a new sub-section—" 3.) The crofter shall be subject to removal at the first term after six months'

notice if convicted of smuggling spirits or allowing smuggling on his holding, or if convicted of felony, or if twice convicted of poaching."—(The Lord Lorat.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON thought the provision was unnecessary, and that the offence of smuggling was already sufficiently provided against. A severe penalty was attached to smuggling. If a crofter was convicted of smuggling he was not likely to hold his croft very long.

Amendment by leave of the Committee withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Provision for resumption by landlord).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved an Amendment dealing with the power of the landlord to withdraw land from a holding for the purpose of feus. He felt quite sure that neither House of Parliament wished that the rights of owners in Scotland should be unreasonably interfered with. On some estates there were landlords who derived much from the feuing value of their land. They looked to it as a means of raising the rental of their property and of recovering some of the immense losses sustained by them in consequence of agricultural depression. The introduction of feuing districts into the Highlands could never be anything but a public advantage. Feuars were of very great importance to the landlords, and there was no conceivable case in which land withdrawn for the purpose of feuing would not be of public service. The Bill provided that land should only be withdrawn for the purpose with the sanction of the Land Commission, and he submitted that that was not a wise restriction. If the landlord took land from the crofter, he always gave ample compensation, and, in the case of larger holdings, clauses were inserted in the leases providing that the landlord might take back land for this particular purpose at a fixed rent. If this Amendment were passed, it would, of course, be in the power of the Land Commission to decide in favour of so large an amount of compensation as would preclude the land from being taken over; but such a contingency he did not fear, as he had every confidence in the reasonableness of the men forming that Body.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 27, leave out ("the Land Commission may on the application of"); in line 38, after ("landlord,") insert ("may,") and leave out ("and upon being satisfied that he desires to.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he did not think the substance of the Amendment differed very much from the intention of the Bill; but he objected to it on the ground of its form. It was quite inconsistent in form with the clause giving the crofter absolute fixity of tenure. Under the noble Duke's Amendment that fixity of tenure would be invaded, and the only power left to the Land Commission would be that of assessing and fixing the amount of compensation to be paid to the crofter in the event of his being removed by his landlord. If this Amendment were passed, the crofters, on whose behalf this Bill was introduced, might fairly argue in this way—"By the 1st clause of this Bill you give us absolute fixity of tenure, and by the 2nd clause you allow that fixity of tenure to a certain extent to be taken away. You allow the landlord, because he is a rich man and able to pay for the luxury of removing us, to turn us out, however injurious it may be to us." Of course, it would be quite possible to fix a prohibitive sum for compensation; but he submitted that the Bill as it stood was a very good Bill. It had been drafted with great care, and had already passed through a great many storms and tempests in "another place," and he hoped it would pass in its present form. This might be regarded as a small Amendment; but to the crofters it was a very large and important one. At any rate, it was one which told on the landlords' side of the case.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he would not press his proposal to a division.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 37, after "Commission,") insert ("whom failing the sheriff of the bounds.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he could not understand under what circumstances such a provision could possibly be necessary.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON also failed to grasp the state of things contemplated by the Mover of the Amendment. The powers of the Land Commission with regard to extension closed by Clause 21 after the expiration of five years. The duties of the Land Commission for other purposes would continue; but he could not see when the action of the Sheriff could be called in, because if the Land Commission were abolished by some future Government, or even by the existing Government, should they remain in Office so long, they would be certain to substitute some authority for it.

LORD ABINGER said, that the Government might or might not make adequate provision.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY pointed out that it was only one of the functions of the Commission that came to an end at the expiration of five years.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD ABINGER moved to include "planting" in those reasonable purposes having relation to the good of the holding for which land might be resumed.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 41, after "letting," insert ("planting.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he objected to the Amendment. He thought the general words would include planting.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY hoped their Lordships would assent to the proposal of his noble Friend. To reject it was to show an absolute want of confidence in the Land Commission by whom the Act was to be administered. To insist on the exclusion of planting was one of the most extraordinary species of tyranny he had ever seen in his life. If it were unnecessary the Land Commission would put it right.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he did not see any harm in adding the word.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he would consider the matter on Report.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of Lord NAPIER and FRISICK, Amendment made, in page 3, line 1, after "industry," by inserting—

("Or for roads practicable for carriages from the croft or crofts to the high road or the seashore.")

LORD ABINGER moved to insert an Amendment giving the Sheriff of the bounds—

"Failing the Land Commissioners, power to give the landlord resumption of a holding for the purposes specified in the Bill."

The Amendment proceeded—

"The landlord shall also have power to resume possession of any croft or crofts for such estate purposes as he may consider necessary upon payment to the crofter or crofters of compensation at the rate of seven years' rent of the croft or crofts so resumed."

A somewhat similar Amendment had worked very well in the Irish Land Act.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 9, after ("Commission,") insert "whom failing the sheriff of the bounds shall determine. The landlord shall also have power to resume possession of any croft or crofts for such estate purpose as he may consider necessary upon payment to the crofter or crofters of compensation at the rate of seven years rent of the croft or crofts so resumed."—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, the Amendment of the noble Lord went a great deal further than the one which, after discussion, had been withdrawn. The Amendment was not compatible with the 1st clause of the Bill, which conferred fixity of tenure upon the crofter. He could not accept it on behalf of the Government.

LORD ABINGER said, they gave fixity of tenure to the tenant, but they practically handed over the landlord's property without any compensation. He had no objection to substitute 10 for seven years; but there ought to be some point at which the landlord could resume possession.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he hoped the Irish Land Act would not be cited as a reason for the passing of this Bill. He objected as much to the provisions of the Bill as any of their Lordships; but he was aware that some such Bill was necessary; and having passed the 1st clause, which practically gave the crofter fixity of tenure, he would not like to be a party to any action which would undo what had been done in the 1st clause. If they gave fixity of tenure, and then said that the landlord might resume the land whenever he pleased, it seemed to him that they were giving with one hand and taking away with the other. It was not a question of how many years' rent the tenant should have as compensation, but of whether he should remain on the land or not. He accepted the Bill as applying to the Highlands of Scotland; but he trusted no such application would be made by other parts of Scotland, nor he hoped was there any necessity for it. He might mention that the only person who seemed under the Bill not to have fixity of tenure was the large tenant. Between the passing of the Act and five years from that time any tenant who had entered into a lease for 19 years might be disturbed at any period between now and five years, whether he liked it or not.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

II.—Rent.

Clause 4 (Present rent) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Rent altered by agreement).

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE moved to alter the wording of this clause, giving power to alter rent by agreement by substituting for the latter part of the clause the following words:—

"The rent so agreed on shall be substituted for the present rent so long as such agreement subsists, and after the expiry thereof so long as no different rent shall have been fixed by the Land Commission upon the application of the landlord or the crofter, and so long as no new agreement between the landlord and the crofter shall have been made."

It was only necessary to add that the object of the alteration was to make the meaning of the clause more clear.

Amendment moved,

In page 3, line 28, leave out from the first ("and") to the end of the clause, and insert—
"The rent so agreed on shall be substituted for the present rent so long as such agreement subsists, and after the expiry thereof so long as no different rent shall have been fixed by the Land Commission upon the application of the landlord or the crofter, and so long as no new agreement between the landlord and the crofter shall have been made."—The Earl of Dalhousie.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, on the second reading he had addressed a good many observations against the principle of the Bill, founded upon what he found was a misunderstanding of this clause. In his opinion, it was by far the most important clause in the Bill. It was a clause in favour of free contract, giving the crofter access to the capital of his landlord. Having excluded the crofter from the benefit of public money for agricultural improvements, it would have been a monstrous injustice to have also prevented him entering into an agreement with his landlord for improvements. But upon inquiry, although the wording excluded such a case, he found it was not the intention of the Government to do so. The Amendment of the noble Lord professed to give what he had advocated, and if it really did so it would materially reduce the mischief which undoubtedly would result from the Bill if such a clause were not inserted. He would accept the Amendment in the meantime, and if he found it did not meet his views of the case, he could move an Amendment on Report.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he would consider the suggestions which had been made before the Report stage of the Bill.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 6 (Fixed rent).

LORD BRAMWELL said, he objected to the term "fair rent," which, although it appeared in the Irish Land Act, ought never to have found its way into any Act. No one knew the meaning of the word. One said it meant such a rent that the man could live and thrive. Those who had to administer the law, as a rule, took off about a fourth. They considered themselves on a mission of reduction. In one case the rent was £6 17s. 4d., and the Commissioners struck off the 7s. 4d. That was absurd.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Why?

LORD BRAMWELL: If £6 10s. was a fair rent, £6 17s. 4d., agreed to, could not be unfair, so as to justify altering it. There was only one clear meaning of fair rent, and it did not apply in this case. That clear meaning was "the rent which one person was willing to take and another person was willing to give." In the sense in which it was used here "fair rent" was an improper term. It represented no definite idea. If there was any idea in the mind of the Legislature, it ought to be so stated that people could act upon it; otherwise they would not avoid the confusion which arose under the Irish Land Act. They ought either to strike out the word "fair" or substitute another for it.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that if the noble and learned Lord wished to propose any Amendment, he ought to give Notice of it. The deduction of 5 per cent might be a small one in the learned Profession to which his noble and learned Friend belonged, but it was of some importance to small crofters. The Bill would be worked by practical men, to whom the word "fair" would have an intelligible meaning, whether it was capable of a legal interpretation or not.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK thought the expression "fair rent" unreasonable, and peculiarly unacceptable in the present state of the Highlands, when no rent would be looked upon as fair. He thought the word "judicial" should be substituted for "fair."

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL had a large amount of sympathy with the noble Lord, and had frequently pointed out in the Irish Land Act that the words "fair rent" had no interpretation except in the breast of the valuator. But the word "fair" was not altogether without precedent in Scottish law. It was used in the Entail Act, and also in the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act. The life tenant of entailed property who might accept a fine and let land at a low rent was prohibited from doing so to the prejudice of his successor. It was provided that no life tenant should let his land except on fair rent. The context showed that a market rent was implied. Clause 11 spoke of "such terms as are usually obtained in the letting of land of the like quality and similarly situated." These words were convertible with "fair rent." But they should be considered with reference to the difference between land taken from a landlord to be added to a croft and land which had been improved in value by the occupying tenant. In the Scottish Valuation Act in dealing with land which was not let assessors were directed to ascertain what was its fair letting value.

LORD WATSON said, he always understood that the only object of the first Act cited by the noble Duke was to prevent a life tenant doing injury to his successors.

On the Motion of The Duke of Richmond, Amendment made, in page 3, line 40, after ("holding,") by inserting "and suitable thereto.")

On the Motion of Lord NAPIER and ETTRICK, Amendment made, in page 3, line 40, after ("executed,") by inserting "is paid for.")

LORD ABINGER moved to insert, in Sub-section 4, the words "upon consignation of the rent due or finding security therefor." Without some such restriction they might take advantage of the clause to avoid paying rent pending the decision of the Commission. In this way they might dispose of their cattle and goods, and when decision was given they might have practically nothing. They should either deposit the money in Court or find security for it.

Amendment moved,

In page 4, line 17, after ("proceedings,") insert ("upon consignation of the rent due or finding security therefor.") — (The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, it might be unfair to compel the crofter to find security for the whole amount. The rent might be £5, but after the valuation it might be fixed at £3, and surely it would be hard that he should have to find security for £5. Besides, in the last line of the clause the Land Commission had a sufficient discretion left them to protect the interests of the landlords.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, that he could not imagine an alteration in the terms of the Act more irritating, more unreasonable, or more inept than this. It was manifestly absolutely impossible that many of the crofters should be able to find security.

LORD WATSON said, that the Commission had a right in this clause to impose any condition as to payment of rent during the stay of execution, and the question was whether the Commission should at discretion exact security or a deposit of the money.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

III.—Renunciation of Tenancy.

Clause 7 (Renunciation of tenancy) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

IV.—Compensation for Improvements.

Clause 8 (Compensation to crofter for improvements on removal) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 9 (Compensation to cottar for improvements on removal).

LORD ABINGER said, he wished to move an Amendment to the effect that compensation for improvements on removal should be only paid when executed by the crofter or his predecessor in the same family "within 30 years."

Amendment moved, in page 5, line 13, after ("family,") insert ("under 30 years.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that there were plenty of cottages with mud walls which stood much longer than 30 years. He thought the Commissioners should be left to decide whether the improvements were exhausted or not, and he hoped that the house would not put in the limit of 30 years.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD ABINGER moved the omission of the sub-section providing that the improvements for which compensation was to be given should not have been "Executed in virtue of any specific agreement in writing under which the cottar was bound to execute such improvement," and to insert in its place—

"Executed in virtue of the stipulations of a lease, or in virtue of any agreement or understanding expressed in estate regulations or other writings."

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 14, leave out sub-section ("c,") and insert ("such improvements as have not been executed in virtue of the stipulations of a lease, or in virtue of any agreement or understanding expressed in estate regulations or other writings.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that it was extremely desirable that the responsibilities of the crofter should be limited to points as to which there could be no doubt whatever. In other parts of the Bill they had refused to have the door open to general regulations and understandings, and had limited the responsibility of the crofter to the specific agreements which he himself had signed, and it would not be consistent if they went away from that principle now.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 10 (Principle of valuation) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

V.—Enlargement of Holdings.

Clause 11 (Application by crofter for enlargement).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved, in page 5, line 27, to insert, after the word "resident," the words "on contiguous holdings." The word "township" had not been raised in the Bill, and yet the principle of the group of crofters had been in the mind of the Government in drawing up the Bill. The five crofters who could make an application for an enlargement of holdings had clearly a reference to a contiguous group, and yet it might so happen that that application was made by one dissatisfied crofter on his property, who might get other four resident 40 miles away, although in the same parish, and they together might go to the Land Commission, and get an enlargement for the one man, while the intention of the Bill was that five crofters in a township should have liberty to apply.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 27, after ("resident") insert ("on contiguous holdings.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK thought the words "on contiguous holdings" were rather too stringent. He would suggest such words as "five occupiers on the same estate," or "not remote from each other." He would remind them that five respectable occupants in a township might have a common interest, yet their five holdings might not be contiguous.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Call it "neighbouring holdings."

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he had no objection to the word "neighbouring."

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was willing to assent to the Amendment with the suggested alteration.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD ABINGER moved, in page 5, line 30, after "crofters," to insert words to the effect that the land to be added should "have been previously held by crofters." He said that if the croft was to be enlarged it was only reasonable that it should be enlarged out of land which some time or other had been in the hands of crofters. He did not want to fix any limit of time.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 30, after ("crofters" insert ("which have been previously held by crofters.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that the noble Lord had overlooked the fact that in many cases crofters had been removed to the seashore from places which they formerly occupied, and it was extremely desirable that there as elsewhere there should be power to enlarge the holdings. These cases might not have been very numerous; still they existed, and the Bill endeavoured to provide for them. If the Amendment were adopted it would certainly not deal with the most plausible of all the grievances of the crofters.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, there would be a difficulty with reference to the interpretation of the term "crofter." It here meant any occupier holding from year to year and paying rent directly to the landlord. But there were many cases in which men had paid to the landlord, and who were deprived of land which actually was in the occupancy of their predecessors of the same class; but these predecessors had not been crofters, but sub-tenants of tackmen. Therefore, the proposal of the noble Lord would deprive present crofters of land which did belong to the same class of people formerly, although not under the same name.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the Amendment would not work. If his noble Friend went back he would find that the whole of the country was in fact held by sub-tenants, and the crofters were the living descendants of those sub-tenants. Where there was no limitation of time he did not think the direction contained in the Amendment would be of any value.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, that this clause provided that occupiers settled on neighbouring holdings might ask for an extension of their holding, which generally meant common pasture in the same parish. But boundaries of parishes were not identical with boundaries of farms or estates, and it might happen that the area available for the extension of the pasture land would be just over the boundary of the parish. He proposed, therefore, to insert the words "or in an adjacent crofting parish." Unless they had these words they ran a great risk of taking away from some parties their right of getting an extension of their holdings. It was a difficulty that might easily occur.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 31, after ("parish") insert ("or in an adjacent crofting parish.")—(The Lord Napier and Ettrick.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he would offer no objection to the Amendment.

LORD ABINGER said, he could not agree with the proposal.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 32, after "land") insert "belonging to the same landlord or landlords."—(The Lord Napier and Ettrick.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he did not object to the provision on principle, but pointed out that it was defective as a piece of drafting.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 12 Intimidation to landlords).

Amendment moved,

In page 6, line 2, after ("heard") insert ("on oath.") and after ("thereupon") insert ("and shall ascertain as far as possible how far the small size of the holdings has been due to the action of the landlord or of the crofters.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was willing to accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of The Lord Napier and Ettrick, Amendment made, in page 6, line 5, after ("parish") insert "or in an adjacent crofting parish belonging to the same landlord or landlords.")

Amendment moved,

In page 6, line 13, after ("land") insert "and to acquire the sheep offering thereto by valuation or otherwise according to the custom of the country."—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he must oppose the Amendment.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK pointed out that if the Amendment were accepted Parliament would impose on the crofter the necessity of taking over sheep stock which might be diseased, or which he might not be competent to manage, or which he might not require. If it were adopted it must remain in many cases utterly inoperative.

LORD ABINGER suggested that there was a danger that the poor landlords might be robbed.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the truth was that landlords in Scotland had got into a very vicious system of valuing sheep and cattle stock. Against that system he had been going for years. Landlords had been in the habit of taking over stock at its full value, and very often at more than its value, whereas it was only reasonable that it should be taken over at the actual market price at the time.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of the Duke of ARGYLL, Amendment made, in page 6, line 26, after ("seaweed", insert ("for agricultural or feeding purposes."

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 13 (Available land).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON moved to omit the word "near." It was impossible for his Lordship to say what was near, as it was altogether a relative term.

Amendment moved, in page 6, line 31, leave out ("or near.")—(The Duke of Richmond and Gordon.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he thought the interpretation of the expression might safely be left to the Land Commission.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL pointed out that it would be very undesirable to confine the expression in any way. There were many cases in the Hebrides where the arable land of the crofts was on the mainland and the pasture on an island a mile or two from the shore. Some of the most bitter quarrels in the Highlands—some that were even now pending—had arisen with regard to grazing on islands.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK moved an Amendment to the effect that the landowner might grant the application of the crofter for an enlargement of his holding to the extent of raising the annual value of the holding from £15, as stated in the Bill, to £30. The definition of a crofter was an occupier who paid rent up to £30, and it seemed logical that if the crofter claimed an enlargement he should be allowed to do so up to the extent of raising the value of his holding to £30.

Amendment moved,

In page 7, line 36, leave out ("fifteen," ) and insert ("thirty," ) and at end of clause add— "In the event of an enlargement of his holding being granted to a crofter by an order of the Land Commission, and in case the crofter shall make application in writing to the landlord for pecuniary and other assistance towards the occupation and stocking of such enlargement, it shall be competent for the landlord and crofter to make a voluntary agreement as to the payment of interest and reimbursement by the crofter to the landlord in consideration of such assistance, and on the written application of the parties concerned to the Land Commission, and with the approval of the Land Commission, such payments may be added to the fixed rent of the holding and form part of the same, under the provisions of this Act, until the claim of the landlord, under the terms of the agreement, or otherwise, has been exhausted."—(The Lord Napier and Ettrick.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, the Government could not accept the Amendment. The Government, in fixing the maximum at £15, had adopted the limit laid down in the Report of the Crofter Commission.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, that was a mistake.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, the Bill was intended to meet the case of the very miserable and smallest crofters, and to enable them to exist in reasonable comfort. It was not the purpose of the Bill to use the power of the State to set them up in a large commercial way of business. Moreover, to take land from one man to give it to another so that he might have a holding worth £30 a-year would be scarcely fair.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, there was no inconsistency with the recommendation in the Report of the Crofter Commission and this Amendment. Their Report was based on the principle of establishing townships, which he still thought was a preferable plan; and they suggested that the maximum average holding need not be more than £15 in value; but this would not have prevented a crofter in the township from having a holding of the value of £30.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE apologized for having misunderstood the noble Lord.

Amendment by leave of the Committee withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill

Clause 14 (Deductions from rent in case of lands held for sporting purposes agreed to, and added to the Bill.)

Clause 15 Assigned land.

Lord DENMAN, in whose name the following new Clause stood upon the Paper:—

"It shall be lawful for all crofters to capture or kill any deer which may have strayed upon their holdings, unless they shall have been unfairly enticed by the crofter."

said, he placed it on the Paper because of Lord Bagot allowing his tenants to shoot deer which had strayed on their holdings. The principle was not unknown in the Crofters (No. 1) Bill, which only cost 4d. more than the Government Bill. Stringent provisions were contained to allow tenants to shoot deer upon their holdings, and to be under the Ground Game Act. If their Lordships did not grant this privilege it was within the power of every landlord to do so. If they had a Dissolution, and this Bill were lost, he hoped this concession would be granted by proprietors. He would have no regret though this Bill were not passed. If they were to have a Dissolution, he hoped the Infants Bill and the Women's Suffrage Bill would not be lost.

Amendment by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 16 Bequest of holding.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in moving the following additional Clause:—

"Provided always that in the case of any legatee or heir-at-law more distant than wife, son, grandson, brother, or son-in-law, it shall be competent to the landlord on his own part, or on the part of neighbouring crofters, to represent that, in the interest and for the comfort of any adjoining crofters, the holding ought to be added to them, so as to increase their size, and in all cases in which the Sheriff shall determine in favour of such representation, the heir, or the legatee, as the case may be, who but for such determination would have succeeded to the holding, shall have right to any claim for compensation for improvements thereon which would have been competent to the deceased crofter if he had been removed at the date of his death."

said, his object in this Amendment was to increase the size of the holdings. There would be many cases in which it would be impossible to increase holdings by annexation of adjacent land. He himself never evicted any widow, son, or other near relative; but only the other day, in a township on the West Coast, a man died, and a distant cousin from Glasgow took possession. There was no chance of increasing holdings if distant relations like that could step in. He hoped the landlord would have power to go before a Sheriff in such a case and agree to pay compensation to the legatee rather than allow him to take possession of land where it was desirable to increase the size of the holdings. This Provision was entirely in the interest of the crofters themselves.

("Provided always, that in the case of any legatee or heir-at-law more distant than wife, son, grandson, brother, or son-in-law, it shall be competent to the landlord on his own part, or on the part of neighbouring crofters, to represent that in the interest and for the comfort of any adjoining crofts the holding ought to be added to them so as to increase their size, and in all cases in which the Sheriff shall determine in favour of such representation, the heir, or the legatee, as the case may be, who but for such determination would have succeeded to the holding, shall have right to any claim of compensation for improvements thereon which would have been competent to the deceased crofter if he had been removed at the date of his death.")—The Duke of Argyll.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that if this Bill had been now put forward for the first time he might have been in a position to accept this Amendment or something like it; but the Bill had passed through a number of changes in "another place," and no Amendment to this effect had, as he understood, had any amount of support from the Representatives of the crofters. The Amendment might be conceived in the interests of the tenants, but he did not think they had that opinion themselves. The Bill established the descendability of the crofter's estate, which he believed the crofters valued, and this Amendment,

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, the crofters valued an increase of their holdings as much as anything else, and he thought the Government would do well to accept an Amendment in the direction of that moved by the noble Duke.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, after consultation he would accept the Amendment provisionally, although possibly the wording would have to be altered on Report. Perhaps the Amendment was one which the crofters would favour if they understood it, and on that ground the Government would give way.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, from his personal knowledge of the crofters, he was certain if they understood the Amendment they would be favourable to it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

VI.—Land Commission.

Clause 17 (Appointment of three Commissioners).

LORD DENMAN said, he approved of one of the Commissioners under the Bill being able to speak Gaelic. He should be perfectly free to oppose the Bill on the third reading; and he was encouraged to take that unusual course by its success the other night in the case of the Durham Sunday Closing Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that in introducing the Bill the noble Lord opposite said that one of the Commissioners should be a trained lawyer of eminence. Now, with all respect to the Scottish Bar, he was afraid it did not always follow that an advocate of 10 years' standing should have attained to a position of eminence. Of course, upon the men chosen depended the proper and safe working of this Act. He should have preferred to have had one of the Judges on the Commission; but, at any rate, it would be satisfactory to have, before this Bill left this House, some notification as to who the Commissioners were to be. They would then be satisfied as to whether the Commissioners were likely to carry out the Act in a manner such as would commend itself to them.

The Earl of Dalhousie

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that he hoped that when the Bill was before the House for the third time he would be in a position to give the names of the Commissioners.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 18 (Area covered by the Act) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 19 (Procedure in fixing fair rent) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 20 (Procedure in enlarging holdings).

Amendment moved,

In page 10, line 37, leave out ("necessary or expedient,") and insert ("just: Provided always, the crofters shall be required to bear a fair share of the said cost.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK thought it was rather a wide power to give the Commissioners. They might order the landlord and the crofters to put up solid stone fence of a mile long, or wire fence five miles long, round the crofters' common pasture without any limitation as to the proportion in which the outlay should fall. It was true that the Royal Commissioners contemplated proposals of that kind; but they all understood that there was to be a fair sharing of the expense. He would suggest that the clause be modified.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE thought the clause should be left as at present. It confided the matter to the Land Commission, and that Body might find cases in which they might hold that the crofters should bear the whole cost. He did not see better provision could be made by laying down directions in the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON pointed out that it was for the benefit of the crofters that the fencing was to be done, and therefore the whole expense should not fall on the landlord.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that the words "just to the parties concerned," or "just, necessary, and expedient," might be introduced on Report if the Amendment were withdrawn.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 21 (Duration of the Act).

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK moved to leave out the clause, and to substitute the following new Clause:—

"The powers of the Land Commission, as defined by the present Act, shall continue for a period of five years from the passing of this Act, and after the expiration of that period all the powers vested in the Land Commission shall be transferred to the sheriffs depute of the counties in which the crofting parishes contemplated by this Act are situated, and shall be vested in them for the purposes of the present Act."

The noble Lord pointed out that Clause 21 contemplated the cessation of the powers of the Commission at the end of five years with reference to one of the most important provisions of the Act. In a great many cases the adjacent sheep farms were held under long leases, and the crofters might never have an opportunity of claiming an enlargement. He did not advocate an unlimited extension of the existence of the Commission. He humbly thought the Commission need never have existed, as the provisions of the Bill might have been cheaply carried out by the existing Judicial Authorities of the country or those authorities otherwise assisted to a slight extent. He did not complain, therefore, of their existence being limited; but what he did object to was that their necessary powers should terminate. He hoped, therefore, that while the Commission should terminate in five years, their powers should fall on those best qualified to carry them out—the sheriffs depute of the counties.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON thought that would be one of the worst clauses of a Bill which he did not think very satisfactory as it was. There was a clause in the Bill limiting the operation of the Act to five years.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, there was no doubt that this Bill would have the effect of stopping improvements, not only on crofters' holdings, but on the grounds adjacent; and, therefore, for Heaven's sake let them have a definite time fixed for its expiration. For his own part, he would avoid all outlay on farms adjacent to crofters' holdings, because it might result in a demand for the farms to be divided. No landlord could with any security go on improving farms which might be claimed in that way, and thus the Bill would operate most seriously against the improvement of the West Highlands.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK thought the noble Duke would not expect the Bill to be limited to a definite period. It was impossible for the crofters to get all their cases disposed of in five years. The subject would be brought up again at the end of five years, when the period for the continuation of the Bill would be enlarged and the authority transferred from the Land Commission to another body. He would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clauses 22 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 32 (Saving in case of holdings in possession of servants).

Amendment moved,

In page 13, line 40, after ("holding,") insert ("or buildings,") and after ("landlord,") insert ("or buildings let to shopkeepers, inspectors of poor, tradesmen, or artisans paying above six pounds of rent.")—(The Lord Abinger.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE believed the Government would be able to accept the Amendment, but he should like time to consider it.

Amendment by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in moving, in page 13, line 42, to insert, after "landlord," at the end of the clause, the following words:—

"Nor on any holdings on which the permanent improvements have been executed by the landlord," said, that in the Irish Act it was provided that where, as in England and Scotland, the improvements were executed by the landlords the estate was exempted. Now, he had, on the small crofts exactly as on the large ones, built the houses, drained the land and inclosed it, and he only asked to have the same law applied to him as had been applied in like circumstances to the Irish landlords.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE opposed the Amendment, on the ground that under it a crofter, by accepting some of the improvements made by the landlord, might shut himself out of the benefits of the Bill. The Amendment would limit the scope of the Bill too much.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, what was necessary was a proper definition of a crofter. He considered the Amendment reasonable and fair. He hoped the Government would consider the question between this and Report.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause 33 (Definitions).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON moved, in page 14, line 2, to insert, after "who," the words "habitually," the object of the Amendment being to define the crofter as one who resided habitually on or near his holding.

*Amendment moved, in page 14, line 2, after ("who," insert ("habitually.")—
The Duke of Richmond and Gordon.)*

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said he must decline to accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of The Duke of Richmond and Gordon, Amendment made in page 14, line 2, by leaving out "or near."

THE EARL OF FIFE said, the Amendment he begged to move would define "permanent improvements" as—

"All improvements which, in the judgment of the Land Commission, shall add to the value of the holding to an incoming tenant."

As this was not an Agricultural Holdings Bill, a general definition was all that was required to guide the Land Commissioners as to what was meant by permanent improvements. If his Amendment were accepted, he would afterwards move to omit the Schedule.

Amendment moved,

In page 14, line 19, leave out after "means") to the end of the paragraph, and insert ("all improvements which, in the judgment of the Land Commission, shall add to the value of the holding to an incoming tenant.")—(The Earl of Fife.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE remarked, that the Amendment comprised what was already comprised in the Schedule. It was necessary, or at all events highly desirable, that the definition should be specific. Crofters were not a very well educated class. It was, therefore, as well to give a few instances of improvement in order that they might the better judge what improvements would entitle to compensation. He hoped the Bill would be allowed to remain as it stood.

The Earl of Galloway

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON considered the Schedule to be far better than the proposal of the noble Lord, because the Amendment would place an almost unlimited power in the Commission to say what they considered permanent improvements. In his opinion it was far better to retain the Schedule, outside of which the Commissioners had no power; therefore, he strongly opposed the Amendment. He might point out that at the end of the Schedule were to be found the very words which the noble Earl now proposed to insert in the body of the Bill.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK stated that there were numerous cases in which improvements were made by tenants which added nothing to the letting value of the holding, but for which, nevertheless, compensation should be granted. Considerable latitude should, therefore, be left to the Commissioners in determining what were really permanent improvements. Improvements of all kinds should be encouraged as an incentive to industry.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

(Clause 34 (Short title) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Schedule.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he had a series of Amendments in respect to the Schedule of the Bill, but he did not intend to press them all; but as the Schedule proposed to give compensation for all kinds of improvements, he proposed in the case of dwelling houses to limit the claim for compensation to two dwelling-houses joined together by a party wall.

Amendment moved,

In page 15, line 1, after ("Dwelling-house," insert "of which the external walls are constructed of stone and lime.")—(The Lord Napier and Ettrick.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he hoped the noble Lord would not press the Amendment, as he believed it would be more satisfactory to leave the question of compensation as it stood to the Commissioners' own sense of justice.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

In page 16, line 10, leave out ("Planting trees.") and insert ("Plantations of trees." — (The Lord Napier and Eltrick.))

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL remarked, that if the Land Commission could not distinguish a plantation when they saw it they might be presumed not to be competent for their other duties. It reminded him of a story he once heard descriptive of the trees in Islay. The trees were said to be very fine, but you could not see them for the grass.

Amendment by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Schedule agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 127.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 27th May, 1886.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.*BELFAST MAIN DRAINAGE BILL.*CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be considered upon Monday next." — (Sir James Corry.)

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S.): On the Question that the Consideration of this Bill be taken on Monday next, I wish to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have down on the Paper a Motion for the insertion of a new clause. It was understood that the Bill was to come on on Tuesday last, and a special Whip was made which secured a large attendance, but an understanding was come to that the Bill was to be postponed until to-day. It is now proposed by the promoters to interfere with that arrangement, and to defer the Consideration of the Bill until Monday. In order to avoid a third disappointment, may I ask if it is intended that the Bill shall be taken on that day?

MR. SPEAKER: The Bill necessarily stood over from Tuesday, because the clause proposed by the hon. Gentleman is opposed, and the Standing Orders require that any matter affecting a Private Bill, of which Notice of opposition is given, shall stand over until the next day of the Sitting of the House, when a day shall be fixed for considering it.

MR. SEXTON: As a new Whip will have to be issued, may I ask if it is definitely fixed that the Bill shall be taken into consideration on Monday?

MR. SPEAKER: All I can say is that the hon. Baronet who is in charge of the Bill has fixed it for Monday.

MR. SEXTON: Will the hon. Baronet give us to understand that it will be taken on that day?

SIR JAMES CORRY: Yes.

Ordered, That the Bill be taken into Consideration on Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA (BOMBAY)—THE INDIAN FACTORY ACT, 1885.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON (Manchester, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table Copies of the Report of a Commission to inquire into the working of the Indian Factory Act issued by the Government of Bombay in 1885; of the Resolution of the Government of Bombay; and, of the Resolution of the Government of India thereupon?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. STAFFORD HOWARD) (Gloucester, Thornbury): The Report of the Commission has not been received; but its recommendations are summarized in the Resolution of the Government of Bombay. The Secretary of State has no objection to lay on the Table this document, together with the proceedings of the Government of India on the subject, if the right hon. Baronet will move for the Papers.

INDIA — ADULTERATION OF WHISKY AT THE CALCUTTA CUSTOM HOUSE.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER London asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to an adulteration of MacGavin and Co.'s whisky at the Calcutta Custom House; and, whether he will communicate with the Government of India on the subject?

Mr. Speaker

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. STAFFORD HOWARD) (Gloucester, Thornbury): Yes, Sir; the Government of India will be asked to inquire into the case.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE CONGO.

MR. HUTTON (Manchester, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When Her Majesty's Government will appoint a Consul to reside on the River Congo, in order that British interests there may be safeguarded, and that the provisions of the Convention of December 1884, between Her Majesty's Government and that of the Congo State, may be carried out?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. BRYCE) (Aberdeen, S.): The reorganization of the Consular Service on the West Coast of Africa is under consideration. The scheme will include the appointment of a Consul on the Congo.

STATE OF IRELAND — CONDUCT OF EMERGENCY MEN AT BALLINAMORE, CO. LEITRIM.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the emergency men in charge of the holding from which John Dignan, Probagh, Ballinamore, county Leitrim, was evicted on the 13th March last, burned the timber of the offices and the lofts of the dwelling house, as well as the bushes planted by the tenant's father, thereby depreciating the value of the holding; whether they also threw down and scattered a rick of hay, and refused to allow John Dignan to rebuild it and save it from loss; whether previous to the expiration of the period allowed for redemption, these acts were legal; whether they were done with the knowledge of the police on protection duty at the place; and, whether there is any means by which the tenant can obtain compensation for the loss?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne), in reply, said, that the police were aware that the caretakers on the farm used some branches from whitethorn bushes growing near the house, and that one or two boards were missing from a hen-roost. There was about 3 cwt. of hay near the house, and the caretakers took some of it for bedding. The estate bailiff gave permission to the men to cut the bushes; but, as matters of private right and legal title were involved in the matter, he was unable to say anything as to the legality of the action, or as to the means by which compensation was to be sought if it was necessary.

THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—THE TRUSTS OF DEDHAM GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether any complaints have been made to the Charity Commissioners concerning the misapplication of the funds of certain charities left for the benefit of free elementary education of the poor in the parish of Dedham, in the county of Essex; and, if so, whether any steps have been taken to prevent any further misapplication; and, whether the money found to have been misapplied has been refunded?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): The Trusts of Dedham Grammar School are partly for elementary and partly for higher education. It is a fact that, in error, a sum of £319 19s. 2d. Consols, belonging to that branch of the Foundation which is for aid to elementary education, was in October, 1882, and February, 1883, sold out, and applied in relief of a charge upon the property of the grammar school branch, for the building and establishment of a public elementary school. The error was in due course discovered, and the sum so erroneously applied has been replaced to the proper account.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. J. PORTER PORTER, J.P., MAGHERACROSS, CO. FERMANAGH

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been called to a report of an assault case heard at the Enniskillen Petty Sessions, which appeared in The Fermanagh Times of May 6th, and in which Mr. J. Porter Porter, J.P. of Magheracross, Ballinamallard, county Fermanagh, was defendant; if Mr. Porter Porter was fined by the Court, and made pay costs for assaulting and beating a boy named James Maguire; and, if Mr. Porter Porter is a justice of the peace for Fermanagh; and, if so, whether the Lord Chancellor will call upon him for an explanation of his conduct?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne), in reply, said, that the Lord Chancellor's attention had not been directed to the matter referred to in the Question until he saw it on the Paper; but he had directed a communication to be sent to Mr. Porter, asking him for any information he can furnish as to his conduct on the occasion referred to.

IRELAND—POPULATION FOR 1886.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What the Irish population of the British Isles is computed to be in the present year 1886; of this population what number live in Great Britain; and, at what rate is the Irish population inhabiting Great Britain increasing or decreasing?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The number of Irish-born persons in the United Kingdom in the present year is estimated by the Irish Registrar General at 5,589,252. The number of these in Great Britain is estimated at 784,519. The rate of increase in the latter is about 680 per annum.

MR. SEXTON asked, did the Return include persons of Irish extraction?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: There is no record on the subject of extraction, therefore I am unable to say.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (SCOTLAND) — EVICTION AT ARDNAMURCHAN.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the eviction of a tenant named Henderson, in Ardnamurchan, by a body of soldiers and sheriffs' officers; whether his wife, who was ill in bed, was carried into the open air by the soldiers, and left with her children without shelter; and, if he will cause inquiry to be made as to the causes which have led to this operation of the Law, which has created much feeling in the district?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, &c.): I have now obtained information in regard to the case referred to in the Question of the hon. Member. It is the fact that Henderson, who had been in difficulties for some time, was lately removed from his farm, which he held from year to year, being in arrears of a rent of £140 per annum for two and a-half years. The removal, which was at the instance of the trustee for his creditors, was carried out by a messenger-at-arms and six commissionaires, and it is therefore not the case that soldiers were employed. In consequence of the state of his wife's health, his landlord offered him a house in Tobermory, rent free for a year, which offer was refused, as also an offer of temporary accommodation in an inn which closely adjoined the house. It was, further, only, upon a certificate from two doctors, that Mrs. Henderson was in a state to be removed without danger, that the removal was carried out.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—PETTY SESSIONS AT TEMPO.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government in Ireland, having granted a patent for a Court of Petty Sessions in Tempo, county Fermanagh, he will see that the Court is held in that place instead of Lisbellaw, or in both places alternately; and, whether he will cause a polling booth to be in Tempo at the next election, so as to prevent men having to walk ten miles to record their vote in Lisbellaw?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne)), in reply, said, that Courts of Petty Sessions were established by order of magistrates at Quarter Sessions. There was no trace of Petty Sessions having ever been held in Tempo. The question of establishing a polling place at Tempo had been considered by the Law Officers, who advised that there was no jurisdiction for doing so.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked, was it not a fact that great inconvenience arose from not having a polling station at Tempo, and would not the Chief Secretary do something to remedy that?

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, he did not know that they had jurisdiction or authority; but he would make inquiries.

THE REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND (IRELAND)—LOANS TO FISHERMEN.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that, three months ago, several Arklow fishermen applied for loans to build fishing boats, on the terms laid down by the Fishery Commissioners, but, as yet, have got no reply to their application; if he can state why the Inspectors of Fisheries have not given effect to the measure in the county of Wicklow, with regard to loans for fishing vessels, on the security of the vessels; and, if he will take steps to have loans made to the fishermen at Arklow, under the rules, so as to encourage the shipbuilding and fishing industries of that town?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne)): The consideration of this matter has stood over, pending the decision on the question as to what districts it was intended to limit the application of the rule made by Lord Carnarvon for extending reproductive loans. The decision we have now arrived at is that the rule can only properly apply to the West and North-West Coasts of Ireland.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)— COLONELS OF THE IRISH MILITIA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, If Her Majesty's Government will take steps to ascertain the number of Colonels of Irish Militia who it is alleged have expressed their intention of taking the field at the head of their Corps to assist the Orangemen of the north-east of Ulster in case of a rising?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.)): I have no doubt that the Colonels of the Irish Militia will do their duty in the same manner as other officers who serve Her Majesty, and I have neither the right nor the inclination to inquire into their political views.

METROPOLIS—THE POLICE—CAPTURE OF DOGS IN THE STREETS.

MR. DAWSON (Leeds, E.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Commissioner of Police has authority under any Act of Parliament to order that dogs shall be captured or their owners summoned when the dogs are under the control of those accompanying them, even if they be not muzzled or led; and, whether he is cognisant of decisions to the contrary effect by stipendiary magistrates of the Metropolis?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. MELLOR) (Grantham) (for Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL): By 30 & 31 Vict., c. 134, s. 18—

"The Commissioner of Police, if he sees fit, may issue a notice requiring any dog while in the streets and not led by some person to be muzzled in such a manner as will admit of the animal breathing and drinking without obstruction; and the police may take possession of any dog found loose in the streets without such muzzle during the currency of such order, and may detain such dog until the owner has claimed it, has provided a proper muzzle, and has paid all expenses connected with such detention."

Mr. DAWSON asked, whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that Mr. Biron had given a decision to the effect that a dog without a muzzle following its owner was to be considered as under proper control?

Mr. MELLOR said, he was not aware of any decision under the Act to which he had referred; but he had seen in the newspapers a letter in which Mr. Biron's decision was mentioned. The proceedings before the magistrate appeared to have been taken under a different Act of Parliament to that above named—namely, the Dogs Act, 1871.

Mr. MACFARLANE (Argyll, asked, whether, as there seemed to be some doubt as to the law on that subject, the hon. and learned Gentleman would try to induce one of the Government Whips to remove the block placed on his (Mr. Macfarlane's) Bill for clearing up the law relating to it?

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS — REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

Mr. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow, asked the Secretary to the Treasury. Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill for the purpose of appointing registrars of voters for Parliamentary elections, in redemption of the assurances given by the First Lord of the Treasury that the Law with respect to the registration of voters would be dealt with in the present Parliament; and, if so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to pass a Bill for the purpose of appointing such registrars of Parliamentary voters in time to enable their attention to be applied to the registration of voters qualified to be placed on the register for the present year, and prior to another General Election?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANS-FELD) (Halifax) (who replied) said: The Government have now under consideration a measure with reference to the law as to registration of voters, which they hope shortly to introduce. But I have no expectation that it will be possible to pass such a measure in time to affect the arrangements for the registration of voters for the present year.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—PAY OF JOINERS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any reply has been sent to the petition of the joiners of Her Majesty's Dockyard, Devonport, submitted some months since; and, whether any improvement will be made in their position?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. R. W. DUFF) (Banffshire) (who replied) said: In view of the present rate of wages in the labour market, and the fact that there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining joiners at the existing Dockyard rates of pay, the Admiralty do not consider that any increase of pay could be justified, nor are they of opinion that any alteration of position is called for. A reply to this effect will be sent.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY—POLITICAL RELATIONS AND INTERNAL CONDITION.

Mr. W. H. SMITH (Strand, Westminster) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the Table any Reports which have been received from Her Majesty's Representatives in Sweden and Norway as to the internal condition of Norway, and the political relations between Sweden and Norway?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BRYCE) (Aberdeen, S.): The Reports to which the right hon. Member refers extend over a considerable space of time, and are of so confidential a character that I do not think they could be published. They will, however, be re-examined, with a view to considering whether they can properly be laid before Parliament.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. VESEY FITZGERALD, R.M.

Mr. LALOR (Queen's Co., Leix) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following circumstances: That Vesey Fitzgerald, esquire, R.M., on the 16th February last, at Maryborough Petty Sessions, made an order for £10, highest penalty, against George Vanston, Poor Rate collector and contractor, on the ground that his workmen interred the corpse of a convict in a private grave without the consent of a relative, and that Vanston lodged an appeal and entered into a recognizance to have his case reheard before the Court of Quarter Sessions: that, subsequently, on the 2nd March, and pending the appeal, said Vesey Fitzgerald, without notice to and in the absence of George Vanston, and another of the convicting justices, altered the order book by inserting that the conviction was under the 41st and 42nd Vic. cap 52, which obliges different statutable requirements to be given with a view to an appeal; whether, on the hearing of the appeal at Quarter Sessions on 16th April, 1886, before Mr. De Moleyns, County Court judge, the said Vesey Fitzgerald during the hearing of the appeal, and contrary to the Act of Parliament, occupied a seat on the Bench, and presided at the hearing, and took part in it; and, is it his intention to recommend a return (under the foregoing circumstances) of the abated penalty of £4 imposed by the County Court judge on the said George Vanston?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne), in reply, said, that the facts were as stated in the first paragraph of the Question. It was found that the wrong statute had been quoted, and it was necessary, so far, to amend the conviction, which the magistrates had power to do. The certificate given to the defendant showed clearly that the conviction had been so amended. The point was raised on the appeal, and was not maintained. Mr. Fitzgerald informed the Government that he was present when the appeal was heard, but that he took no part in the hearing of it. There did not appear to be any good reason for interference in the matter.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—ROSSKEEN SCHOOL BOARD, ROSS-SHIRE—THE TEACHERS.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.) (for Dr. MACDONALD) asked

the Lord Advocate, Whether the School Board of Rosskeen, Ross-shire, has intimated to its teachers, in a letter dated 11th May, 1886, that the Board has fixed the terms of a new engagement, that the teachers were to get thirteen days to agree to the new terms, and that, in the event of the teachers not agreeing to the new terms, their engagement with the Board would terminate three months after the date of the Board's letter; whether one of the terms of the new engagement is as follows: That the teacher shall have as principal part of his emoluments

"the school fees collected as at present," that is, "the school fees from time to time as he collects the same himself, which he is hereby taken bound to do, the School Board giving him assistance to recover when in their opinion necessary, the School Board and their successors in office under no circumstances being liable to make good arrears of fees not collected by the teacher;"

whether the teachers are bound to sustain the loss of all school fees not collected by them, while they have no locus standi to sue the defaulters; and, whether, in the event of the teachers declining to accept these new terms within the thirteen days allowed them by the Board, the Education Department will allow the School Board to dismiss them at the end of three months, of which notice has already been given them that their present engagements with the Board will terminate?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) (Clackmannan, &c.): The Scottish Education Department has been in communication with the school board of Rosskeen with regard to the terms of the agreement referred to in his recent question. Their Lordships are now informed that the Board have resolved "to terminate the former agreement, and to give the teachers a fixed sum from the rates, the school fees collected as at present, and a fixed proportionate share of the grant."

This information does not enable my Lords to judge how far the new agreement conforms to the Code, and they are in communication with the school board on the subject. But legal questions arising out of contracts with teachers do not fall within their Lordships' province, and school boards are not responsible to the Department in the exercise of their powers of dismissal.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. FRANK BROOKE, J.P., OF BROOKBOROUGH.

“ Brother Orangemen, if England spurns us from her then, and if by the vote of the men who are tied hand and foot to Gladstone’s chariot wheels and who would follow him to — sooner than vote against him, if I say by these votes Home Rule is granted to the Parnellite rebels, then I say England scorns us, and we must let her know with no uncertain sound that we, the loyal minority, will not allow the rebels to place their yoke around our necks, at least without a struggle, and before accepting their law as the law of the land we will rise as one man, and fight for our liberties, our homes, and our glorious religion: ” whether Mr. Brooke acknowledged that this was in every respect an accurate report of what he said on the occasion, and declared that he was unable to withdraw or qualify a single statement, at the same time saying that while he admitted as a general rule citizens were bound to yield obedience to the legislative and executive authority, that he also held that in exceptional cases that authority might be such as to make “ resistance ” to its power a “ right, if not a duty: ” whether the Lord Chancellor has intimated that he did not feel called upon to take further action in the case; and, whether the Government will take any steps to mark their condemnation of Mr. Brooke’s language as a magistrate?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Before the Question is answered, allow me to ask the Chief Secretary, whether, considering that the matter has been already disposed of by the Lord Chancellor, he will not postpone any further action on the subject, and leave it to be settled between the Parnellite Parliament and the hon. Gentleman who asks the Question?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MONKEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne,): No, Sir; I think I had better deal with it now. I think that everybody—hon. Members in all parts of the House—must feel very strong disapprobation indeed at the language used by Mr. Brooke. That gentleman, however, in his letter to the Lord Chancellor, practically disclaimed any intention to counsel resistance to any measure now before Parliament; and, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, we do not think it necessary or expedient to have recourse to the extreme measure of removing him from the Commission of the Peace.

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—ALLOWANCES TO LIGHTKEEPERS.

MR. WILLIAM O’BRIEN (Tyrone, S.) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any decision has yet been come to with respect to the memorial for increase of pay, &c. of the lightkeepers of the Irish coasts, which was presented about a year ago, with a recommendation from the Commissioners of Irish Lights; and, if so, whether he can announce what steps will be taken to put the Irish on an equal footing with English light-keepers; and, when the long-deferred increases of salary may be expected to come into operation?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD (Mr. C. T. D. ACLAND, Cornwall, Launceston) (who replied) said: It was in January last, and not about a year ago, that the Commissioners of Irish lights forwarded to the Board of Trade for statutory declaration a proposal for certain increased allowances being paid to the lightkeepers in their service. The whole information necessary to enable the Board to come to a decision on this proposal has not yet been forwarded by the Commissioners, and they have been asked to supply it.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—THE LAW OF EJECTMENT NOTICES—CASE OF TIMOTHY CONWAY, OF DOON, CO. LIMERICK.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the neglect of a landlord to serve with an ejectment notice a sub-tenant renders the ejectment of the principal tenant illegal; Whether Timothy Conway, of Doon, county Limerick, has been recently evicted, no notice having been served on a Mrs. Hayes, who was a sub-tenant of his for eight years; whether Mrs.

Hayes is still in possession, and was never evicted; whether Conway's farm is now in possession of caretakers guarded by several policemen; whether the Irish Government will order the withdrawal of the policemen until the landlord complies with the requirements of the Law; and, whether the evicting landlord in this case is Major Hare, Brompton Lodge, Chester?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne), in reply, said, that the answer to paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 6 in the Question was in the affirmative. There is some doubt as to whether this was a case of sub-tenancy. The omission to serve a sub-tenant would in some cases be a sufficient defence, in other cases it would not. But it should have been put forward at the hearing, and, under the circumstances, the ejectment was considered to be not illegal. The police were necessary, and could not be withdrawn.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MODEL SCHOOLS—COMPULSORY PREPAYMENT ON ADMISSION.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the twenty-nine model schools in Ireland, the Commissioners of Education, who are the managers of those schools, insist on prepayment as a condition of admission to the schools; whether the managers of all other National schools in Ireland have the same right, and have often exercised it, especially in Ulster; and, whether the arrangement and mode of payment of school fees is vested in the manager of National schools by Rule 173 (last revised Code). Rule,

"So far as practicable a further income must be secured to teachers of National schools by school fees, &c., and the arrangement of school fees is to be made by the managers?"

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne : Sir, the answer to the first paragraph of the Question is yes; but I have further to say that a third of the pupils pay only 1s. 1d. a-quarter. The rule of the Commissioners is that, so far as practicable, the managers are authorized to levy school fees in advance; but the Commissioners would feel bound to interfere if the right were exercised unreasonably or to the prejudice of individuals. In reply to a further inquiry, of which the hon. Member has given me private Notice, I have to say that the rules say nothing on the subject of arrears; but, bearing in mind that the National Schools are designed for the education of the poor of Ireland, the Commissioners have always held that the proper course is to recover arrears by process at Petty Sessions, and not to resort to the extreme step of expelling a child from the school with a view to enforce payment.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — THE CAVAN MILITIA—CAPTAIN LESLIE.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any undue pressure was brought to bear on Captain Leslie, of the Cavan Militia, to induce him to resign his Commission; what reason did he assign for so doing; how many vacancies are in the regiment now; and, whether it is the intention of the authorities to promote Lieutenant William Malcomson to one of the vacant companies in the regiment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.), in reply, said, that, as far as was known at the War Office, the resignation of Captain Leslie was entirely voluntary—on the ground that he was unable to remain with his regiment. Following the usual course, the vacancy so caused would be filled in accordance with the recommendation of the Military Authorities in Ireland, which he had not yet received.

ARMY (INDIA)—CASE OF BRIGADE-SURGEON ROSS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to the case of Brigade Surgeon James Ross, of the Madras Army, compulsorily retired in 1885, Whether, having entered the service of the East India Company in January 1857, and served two months after reaching the age of 55, his retirement was enforced under regulations which have been made subsequently to the Act of the 21st and 22nd Vic., c. 105, s. 55 (commonly known as the "Henley Clause"), in violation of that section, which provides that those serving in the Military Forces of the East India Company are

"to be entitled to the like privileges and like advantages as regards promotion, and otherwise, as if they had continued in the service of the said Company ;"

if he would explain to the House on what grounds an exception, expressly made by Act of Parliament in favour of Officers then in the service of the Company, is set aside in this case on the authority of the regulations made in 1858 and 1860 ; whether such action of the Military authorities is legal ; and, whether steps cannot be taken to place him on the footing to which he appears to be entitled by virtue of the " Henley Clause."

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STAFFORD HOWARD) (Gloucester, Thornbury) : The action of the Military Authorities—that is, of the Government of Madras—in the case of Brigade Surgeon Ross was legal. The clause of the Act referred to has never been held to bar Her Majesty's Government from a reasonable exercise of the power, which the Court of Directors possessed and used, of altering, in the interests of the public service, the conditions under which their officers were employed. The promotion of officers of the Indian Medical Service has not been altered for the worse ; but it was found, following the rule in Her Majesty's Service, essential to efficiency to limit the service of officers of the Executive grade to the age of 55 years, capable, however, on the production of a certificate of perfect efficiency, of an extension to the age of 58 years. This certificate Brigade Surgeon Ross did not obtain, and he was accordingly retired under the regulation which has been in force for nearly 27 years. But whilst, with a corresponding service under the rules in force when he joined the Indian Medical Department, he would have been entitled to a retiring pension of £250 a-year, he now receives one of £500.

SPAIN—THE COMMERCIAL CONVENTION—DUTIES ON IRON.

Mr. JACKS (Leith, &c.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If there is any Schedule, connected with Parliamentary Paper No. 9, showing the amount of Duty which under the new Convention will be charged by Spain on pig iron, iron bars, plates, sheets, rails, and tubes, also on steel bars, plates, sheets, rails, and tubes, and on cast iron pipes ; if not, if he can state to the House what those Duties will be ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BRYCE) (Aberdeen, S.) : A Paper laid before Parliament last year (161) sets forth the reduced duties which will be levied on the articles specified by the hon. Member under the new Convention with Spain. It is proposed to append this Paper to the copies of the Spanish Treaties with France and Germany, which are about to be presented to Parliament.

METROPOLIS—THE PARKS—GREENWICH PARK—HOURS OF ADMISSION.

Mr. EVELYN (Deptford) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that Greenwich Park is not open to the public before 7 a.m., to the great inconvenience of neighbouring residents, and especially of working men ; and, whether, since other Royal Parks are open at 5 a.m., there would be any objection to placing Greenwich Park under similar regulations to those of the other Royal Parks ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CHILDERS) (Edinburgh, S.), in reply, said, he would give an answer to-morrow.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (IRELAND)—GLANDERS—COMPULSORY SLAUGHTER OF A HORSE—COMPENSATION.

MAJOR SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On what grounds compensation was refused to Edward Brady, of Pollabee, in the county of Cavan, for the slaughter of his mare, suffering from glanders, the said mare having been slaughtered in pursuance of an Order of the Irish Privy Council ; and, whether some compensation is not due to Edward Brady to recoup him for his loss ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne)), in reply, said, that there was no provision in the Orders of Council authorizing the Local Authority to compensate for the slaughter of an animal suffering from glanders, and no sufficient case existed for the alteration of that rule.

PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES)—
TRANSFERENCE OF CONVICTS.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the objectionable scenes which have occurred, on various occasions, in connection with the public removal of convicts and other prisoners by Railway from one establishment to another, the Government will adopt the practice, long in use in Belgium, of appropriating one or more Railway carriages of special construction for the less exposed transit of prisoners?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CHILDERS) (Edinburgh, S.): In reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that my attention has never been called to any objectionable scenes in connection with the removal of prisoners by railway, and I do not know to what particular instances the hon. Baronet refers. In the absence of any evidence to show me that the present system is a bad one and liable to abuse, I should not feel justified in proposing any change, which could only be carried out at very great cost.

NAVY—H.M.S. "COLLINGWOOD"— BURSTING OF THE 43-TON GUN.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, How many guns have been constructed similar to the 43-ton gun which recently failed on board H.M.S. Collingwood, and at what cost per gun; how many such guns have been issued and are in service; and, whether steps have been taken to prevent risk from the firing of any of these guns until inquiry has been made into the cause of the failure of the Collingwood gun, and the necessity for and best means of strengthening such guns?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): As so many Questions are being asked on this subject, perhaps the House would allow me to state, as briefly as I can, the actual history of the case. The gun to which the accident occurred on board the Collingwood was of a pattern designed in the Royal Gun Factories, and was constructed of a steel tube, jacketed with wrought-iron and steel. The design was submitted to the Ordnance Committee, and was by them provisionally approved, to govern the manufacture of guns then under order, leaving the question of the best construction for future guns of the same calibre an open one. Upon Sir William Armstrong and Co. being invited to tender for the manufacture of guns of this description, they raised doubts as to certain features of the design, and as to the form in which the material was employed. The whole question of the construction of heavy rifled guns was thereupon referred to the Ordnance Committee, who, in August, 1882, recommended that the use of wrought-iron in gun manufacture should be abandoned, and that the manufacture of wrought-iron guns should be discontinued; and in September, 1882, they submitted, among other designs, one for the future manufacture of 12-inch guns to be made entirely of steel. It was considered by the War Office—and in this opinion the Admiralty concurred—that a steel gun should be fully tried before the design was finally adopted. Meantime, the guns being made in Royal Gun Factories, among which were five intended for the Navy, had been so far advanced in manufacture that the construction could not be altered, and the Admiralty agreed to these five being completed, and to six other guns required for the Navy being made to the same design, if the Secretary of State considered it satisfactory. A question on this point was referred to the Ordnance Committee, who, while adhering to their previously expressed view that no more guns of the pattern in question should be made, expressed the opinion that, should the exigencies of the Service require it, the six guns under manufacture in Royal Gun Factories might be appropriated for naval service. They added, in a subsequent Report, that in their opinion the guns in question were safe and trustworthy, provided the charge used did not give a pressure of over 15 tons per square inch in the chamber. The Admiralty were informed, and, as guns were required for the Navy, those referred to were appropriated for that service. In all, 14 guns of this design were made, those of subsequent manufacture being of steel, and of modified design. In February, 1885, owing to the accident with a 6-inch gun on board the Active, and certain failures at proof, the whole question of the construction of breech-loading guns was again referred to the Committee, which was composed of the President and some Members of the Ordnance Committee, having associated with them the following Gentlemen:—namely, Sir William Armstrong, C.B., Captain A. Noble, C.B., of the Elswick firm; Mr. Leece, of the firm of Sir Joseph Whitworth and Co.; Sir Frederick Abel, C.B., Chemist, War Department; and Colonel Maitland, R.A., Superintendent of Royal Gun Factories. It is to be observed that of these Gentlemen none had been concerned in the design of the 12-inch guns particularly in question, except Colonel Maitland. The Committee, as above constituted, reported in May, 1885, and the terms of their recommendations with regard to guns of the design in question were as follows:—"To remain unaltered; but the charge of 295 lbs. cocoa powder not to be exceeded." Under the above circumstances it has been thought desirable to submit, in the first place, the questions arising out of the recent accident to investigations and report by the Ordnance Committee, as at present existing, with the same associated Members as before, except that another member of the firm of Sir Joseph Whitworth and Co. will be nominated in place of Mr. Leece, who has died since the last inquiry.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) asked, whether the answer of the right hon. Gentleman could be printed and circulated among Members, especially military and naval Members, who were interested in the question?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman may be perfectly assured that the answer will be printed in the newspapers to-morrow morning.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War. How many Members of the Committee recently appointed to inquire into the failure of the 43-ton gun on board H.M.S. Collingwood, have been, and how many have not been, directly or indirectly concerned in the design, construction, consideration, or approval of guns of this description, specifying the names of any such independent Members of the Committee?

"No reply."

COLONEL SALIS-SCHWABE (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether he will defer the commencement of the manufacture of new guns at Woolwich until he has received the Report of the Committee now considering the bursting of the 43-ton gun; and, what sum is estimated for the manufacture of guns at Woolwich during the current year?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The 12-inch breech-loading guns now in process of manufacture are entirely different in their construction from the gun which blew its chase off on board the Collingwood; consequently, there does not seem to be any reason why the manufacture should be stopped. My hon. and gallant Friend will see, if he refers to the Army Estimates, that the sum of £294,727 is taken as the charge for the Royal Gun Factory during the year. This may be held to represent the cost of guns to be made at Woolwich during the year.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—

"BOYCOTTING"—CASE OF PATRICK DEVANY, ROSSCAHILL, CO. GALWAY.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a young man, named Patrick Devany, residing at Rosscahill, near Oughterard, county Galway, is boycotted on account of his father having taken some three acres of land, from which the previous tenant had been evicted, in consequence of his not having paid any rent for six years; whether Devany was ordered by the parish priest, Father Coyne, to leave the chapel in consequence on March 24th last; whether this reverend gentleman is President of the local branch of the National League; whether this is the same Father Coyne who denounced the local landlord, Mr. Martin, of Ross, from the altar a few years since with the result that a police hut had forthwith to be erected for the protection of the bailiff and steward; and, whether the refusal to give Devany employment under the Government relief works was in any way to be attributed to the action of Father Coyne and the National League?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY Newcastle-on-Tyne): Sir, the facts are substantially as stated as regards Patrick Devany, who was partially "Boycotted" for the reason that his father took a farm from which the previous tenant had been evicted owing three years' rent. On the occasion when Devany was asked to leave the chapel the congregation had all previously gone out. The erection of the police hut at Ross was in consequence of the posting of a threatening notice to Mr. Martin. The refusal to give Devany employment appears to have been the act of the overseer. No evidence of an illegal act towards Devany, so far as the Government know, has been disclosed.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—
THE DISTURBANCES AT LISTOWEL.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has had any further information regarding the recent disturbances at Listowel, which would show that the original summonses issued by the police at the instance of the Town Commissioners were withdrawn by their direction, the disturbances having been directed against a boycotted gentleman; and, whether the only proceedings taken against the parties have been under Common Law, with the view of merely binding them over to keep the peace?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The prosecutions, which were instituted under the Towns Improvement Act in this case, fell through in consequence of the Town Commissioners directing the clerk not to prosecute. The police, thereupon, acting upon instructions, took such proceedings as were open to them under the general law, with the result that six of the defendants have been bound over to be of good behaviour for 12 months.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PROMOTION.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether promotion in the Royal Irish Constabulary is regulated by selection exclusively, and without any regard to seniority; whether it is a fact that such promotion is entirely in the gift of County Inspectors, without the right of appeal in such cases where a constable considers he has been unjustly passed over for promotion; up to what age are constables deemed eligible for promotion to the higher grades; whether the Inspector General of Constabulary, and the County Inspector of each County, fix their own standard of age for promotion; whether he will grant a Return of constables promoted to the rank of acting sergeants and up to the rank of head constables respectively within the last two years, stating their periods of service, conduct, and the different religious denominations to which they respectively belong; also the number of constables unpromoted from twelve to twenty years' service, specifying the different religious denominations to which they belong, and likewise the religion of the County Inspectors under whom they served; also the number of County Inspectors' clerks, and their religion respectively; whether it is a fact that none are allowed to undergo the examination for these clerkships except those recommended by County Inspectors; and, what is the strength of the different religious denominations of the Irish Constabulary?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Sir, these queries are rather awkwardly arranged in the Question, and I have taken the liberty of answering the paragraphs in a more convenient order than that in which they stand. I will take the first, third, and fourth paragraphs, and my answer to them is "No." It is not the fact that promotion in the Royal Irish Constabulary is regulated by selection exclusively. On the contrary, the regulations enjoin that due weight must be given to seniority; and the Inspector General informs me that he is careful to enforce this regulation. There is no limit of age for promotion. In respect to the second paragraph of the Question, I have to say that promotion is not in the gift of the County Inspectors. County and District Inspectors have the recommendation in their hands; but it rests with the Inspector General to sanction; and every man who considers himself aggrieved has the right of appeal to the latter officer—a right which I am informed is freely exercised. Candidates for the office of clerk must be recommended by their County Inspectors before they can be appointed. The Return on the subject of promotion which the hon. Member suggests would involve a considerable amount of trouble and local inquiry, and would be calculated to give rise to sectarian difficulties which, happily, at present do not exist. Moreover, the Inspector General assures me that while he has no reason to suspect that sectarian or other improper feeling operates in the selection of men for promotion, he is always watchful lest, even unconsciously, any bias should be observable in the recommendations. For these reasons, I am not prepared to assent to the Returns. As regards the religious constitution of the Force generally, if the hon. Member will look at Parliamentary Paper No. 256 of Session 1880, he will see how matters stood then, and I do not suppose that any material alteration has since taken place in the relative numbers.

SPAIN—THE COMMERCIAL CONVENTION—THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in regard to the new Convention with Spain, and especially to the third of the points in the attached explanatory Letter, Whether there is implied in the Convention any obligation on the part of British Colonies to modify their wine duties in accordance with Article II. of the Convention, before they can enjoy most-favoured-nation treatment under the Convention; or, whether the conditional modification of the duties on wine is absolutely confined to the tariff in force in the United Kingdom?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The new Commercial Convention with Spain imposes no obligation upon the Colonies to modify their Wine Duties. The proposed modification of the alcoholic scale applies to the United Kingdom alone.

SECRET SERVICE MONEY.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, when examining the whole question of Secret Service Money, he will also consider the desirability of issuing a new Treasury Warrant to divert the statutable payment of £10,000, now made to the Patronage Secretary, and said to be used for political party purposes, from the Patronage Secretary to the Secretaries of State, and thereby economise an equivalent sum voted in the Estimates on account of Secret Service?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The points mentioned in the Question of my hon. Friend are, I consider, included in the engagement I made to the House the other night.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND AND SALE AND PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILLS.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will state whether Her Majesty's Government regard the Government of Ireland Bill and the Sale and Purchase of Land (Ireland) Bill as still inseparably connected?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have no addition to make to the declarations on this subject which are contained in a speech made by me in introducing the Land Purchase Bill. The subject is there referred to several times; and if it is not convenient to the hon. Member to make the references, I will be most happy to place in his hands a copy with the passages marked. They will be found at pages 3, 4, 10, 15, 17, and 26; and they will enlighten the hon. Member very fully as to the views of the Government.

MR. NORRIS: May I be allowed to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is quoting from any newspaper, Herald, or what?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (handing a copy of a pamphlet to Mr. Herbert Gladstone, apparently with the view of passing it to the hon. Member): The report is one which, though not corrected by me throughout, has yet been corrected in the most important parts, and is, I believe, to be relied upon as being substantially accurate in the passages to which I have referred the hon. Gentleman.

H.M. BIRTHDAY—TROOPING OF THE COLOURS.

In answer to Sir JOHN R. MOWBRAY, THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) said, the arrangements connected with the ceremony of trooping the Colours on Her Majesty's birthday did not rest with the Secretary of State for War, but with the officer commanding the Brigade of Guards. He would, however, take care that the right hon. Baronet's wish that facilities should be afforded to Members of Parliament to witness the ceremony should be conveyed to him.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL—
MEETING AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): It is reported—I do not know with what accuracy—that the right hon. Gentleman opposite the First Lord of the Treasury has made a statement, at a certain meeting, with respect to the Government of Ireland Bill. As that Bill stands second on the Orders of the Day for this evening, I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman himself would wish, before proceeding with the debate, that the House, as a whole, should be in full possession of the intentions and views of Her Majesty's Government in that matter; and I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will make a similar statement to the House now?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I must say I feel flattered by the Question of the right hon. Gentleman; for I do not recollect that, on any former occasion, a meeting of Members of any particular Party in this House has been viewed with such general interest as to cause requests to be made across the Table to the person principally concerned in that proceeding to give to the House the purport of what he stated. As I said, I feel it to be a great compliment. If we could only have had the company of the right hon. Gentleman, he would not need to ask us our intentions; but it was impossible, however catholic our intentions might have been, for us so to frame our invitation as to make it possible for the right hon. Gentleman to give us the benefit of his attendance. It is true that the Bill stands second on the Orders of the Day for tonight; but I am not able to say whether it will be reached. I hope it may; but the greatest objection I have to complying in full with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman is that I am afraid that, though I considered it was my duty to detain that meeting of my political Friends for upwards of three-quarters of an hour to an hour, I should feel considerable difficulty in inflicting so long a statement upon the House, for physical causes and other grounds. Nor could I undertake to abridge it. I have no guarantee, but I hope it will be reported—accurately reported—in the newspapers to-morrow, so that, if it be of any interest to Members at large, they will be in possession of it, or, at any rate, of the greater part of what I said.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I will put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman, which, perhaps, he will be able to answer within a reasonable compass. I will ask, did that statement announce any change in the intentions of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the measure; and, if so, will he tell us, before calling on us to proceed with the debate, what that change is?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that anything has taken place so material—

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I do not know.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is very difficult, perhaps, for him to form a judgment; it is also extremely difficult for me; but there is no change that I can state in the course of a few words. It has been a general development. I told that meeting what the object of the Government was in inviting our political Friends—those who were Friends on this question—to the Foreign Office. Our object was to convey to them precisely the views of the Government with respect to the second reading, and what was involved in the second reading; and, likewise, the views of the Government on certain points which had been more or less mentioned in the debate, and which we knew to be subjects of interest to them. It would be extremely difficult for me, and I do not think I could undertake to give a repetition of the statement I then made here. I will say, however, that our intentions were expressed in a former debate on the subject of the intervention of Ireland by her Representatives on Imperial questions; but I could not undertake to make a repetition of that statement except in full.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I will ask, then, a Question on one definite point. Did the right hon. Gentleman state that, supposing the Bill to receive a second reading at the hands of the House, it would then be withdrawn?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I did not use those words. I could not state even this, without giving the reasons for it to which I adverted. I stated that no application would be made to take further steps in the prosecution of the Bill within the compass of the ordinary Session of Parliament.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. John Morley, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. John Morley.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.), in rising to move the following Amendment, which stood in his name upon the Notice Paper:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, no measure dealing with the disarmament of Orange districts will be satisfactory or impartially administered which requires to be put in force by a proclamation of the Irish Privy Council, composed almost entirely of members of or sympathisers with the Orange organisation," said, he had hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant would have been able, at the beginning of the debate, to make some statement which would, perhaps, obviate the necessity of him (Mr. Healy) moving the Amendment. Would the right hon. Gentleman inform them exactly by what means he proposed to put the Bill into operation? He (Mr. Healy) altogether objected to such an Act being put in force by the Privy Council in Ireland, for many of them—indeed, by far the most—were very strong politicians indeed. He had to remind the House that the Bill was stated to be one for the purpose of disarming Orangemen in the North of Ireland and elsewhere, who were in the habit of going to meetings with arms in their hands. The House would remember that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) stated that, on the occasion of some meetings of Orangemen, "sackfuls of revolvers" were taken from them. That being so, he (Mr. Healy) had called the attention of the Chief Secretary to the fact that either the position of those who carried these revolvers was legal or illegal. If legal, whether there were "sackfuls" or otherwise, they should not have been interfered with; but, if illegal, they should have been prosecuted. He would also point out that over the whole of Ireland only some 60 or 70 prosecutions took place, and that the law was only enforced in one portion of Ireland in the instances he gave. The House would, therefore, see that they had the best reason for looking with suspicion upon the course which the Government had chosen to take in this matter. They had brought in the Bill ostensibly for the purpose of preventing large bodies of men coming to meetings with arms in their hands. But in the North of Ireland, against which the Bill was presumed to operate, what was the state of affairs? At present none of its provisions were in force in Antrim, Down, Derry, or Armagh, or, at all events, not in a large part of the latter. Did the House expect that, in times of excitement, Privy Councillors would be likely to spend even a five-pound note in journeying to Dublin to put an Act in force in districts in which they did not wish it to be enforced? What guarantee had they, if they passed the Act, that it would not be used for the whole of Ireland, but only for the lower Provinces—in fact, that it would not be used against the Orangemen at all? Men who talked so glibly about being prepared to shed the blood of Her Majesty's subjects would not be particular. The whole of the County Antrim remained, at the present moment, unproclaimed; and if the Bill was intended to put down armed bands of men in the County Antrim, or to be enforced, then why was not the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation issued? He saw that, at the present time, the Privy Council in Ireland, who were to direct the operations of the Bill, was composed of a number of Gentlemen in whom the people had no confidence; and it was, doubtless, owing to that that the Lord Lieutenant could not put the law in force in the North of Ireland, except by and with the advice of the Privy Council. Thus the Act could not be put in force without the assent of the Privy Council, and the House should bear in mind that there was not amongst that body any person in whom the general body of the people had hitherto been able to place the smallest confidence. Why, the people could not even get magistrates upon the Bench in Ireland, much less upon the Privy Council, in whose decisions they could repose confidence. As an instance, he would point to the fact that his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had been removed from the Commission of the Peace. If he, the most representative and important man in Ireland, was not even allowed to sit upon the Magisterial Benches, was it to be supposed for a moment that he would be elected a Member of the Privy Council? He (Mr. Healy) found a list of the Members of that Body in Thom's Almanack for 1885, and it certainly afforded a most instructive study. The first name he found was that of the Prince of Wales, and, following those, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Lord Chancellor (of that time, who was Lord Ashbourne), the Duke of Leinster, the Marquess of Waterford, the Marquess of Drogheda, the Marquess of Headfort, the Marquess of Hartington, the Earl of Meath, the Earl of Belmore, Viscount Monck, and so on, with several other noble Lords. The Irish Judges, Lord FitzGerald, the late Irish Chief Secretary, Sir William Hart Dyke, Sir Robert Peel—and any measure which could be brought forward to secure that the right hon. Baronet who lately represented Tamworth should attend would be most acceptable—Mr. Justice Morris, Mr. Justice Chatterton, Mr. Justice Warren, Lord Justice Barry, Baron Dowse, Baron Palles, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Judge Ormsby, Chief Justice May, Mr. James Lowther, Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, Mr. Justice Johnson, Mr. Justice Porter, Lord Chancellor Naish, Mr. Hugh Holmes, late Attorney General for Ireland, Colonel E. R. King-Harman, Mr. John Monroe, Mr. Henry Bruen, &c., &c. In fact, a greater collection of curiosities was, perhaps, never gathered together into the Council Chamber. He would like to know, for one thing, if the Chief Secretary was to sit upon one side of the Table, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman), The O'Connor Don, Mr. M'Murrough Kavanagh, and the others, were to sit opposite to him, what chance there would be of this Act being put in force in the North of Ireland? Those were the very Gentlemen who were recommending civil war in the North of Ireland, and they would every one of them insist upon the right of going into the Council Chamber, just as had been done in England when the Whig Peers interfered to prevent the bringing over of a Jacobite Prince, when the succession to Queen Anne was about being settled. How could they expect that men who advised the Orangemen to engage in civil war would, in the Privy Council Chamber, allow the Lord Lieutenant to use this Act against the Orangemen? They were not the men he took them for if they allowed any such thing. It might be said that the Judges would exercise a deliberate influence upon these Gentlemen; but there could be no guarantee that the Act would be properly enforced by the Privy Council as it was now constituted. Was he to be told that a man like Judge Lawson would not back them up, and give such men absolution afterwards in the Queen's Bench, if they were charged with high treason? The Government must be prepared to make large concessions as regarded the constitution of the Privy Council. Why should not the hon. Member for the City of Cork be on the Privy Council in preference to the noble Lord who represented the Isle of Arran? He (Mr. Healy) certainly was at a loss to know on what principle the Bill proceeded. He should prefer to leave the matter to the Lord Lieutenant in person, and he could not see why the Government could not accept his Amendment. The Lord Lieutenant was a responsible person; his words could be noted, and he was represented in the House by the Chief Secretary; but they could not have the same control over such men as the Representative of the Isle of Thanet, Mr. Bruen, or Justice Lawson. They would be exercising their Constitutional right, it was true, and no fault could be found with them; but he did not like the system. There was a way out of the difficulty. They were told by the Prime Minister that, in all probability, there would be an Autumn Session upon the Home Rule Bill. In the meantime the Orangemen, in order to prevent the Bill passing, would undertake the very same sort of amusement that they indulged in to prevent the passing of the Franchise Act. The interval would be used by those who pulled the string of the Orange Party, like the strings of marionettes were pulled for Paddington, Armagh, and North Down. They would get up a sort of gymnastic meeting with revolvers in their hands, and if the Act passed as it stood any amount of human gore might follow, and the Government would have a lively time of it. Now, what he would propose was this—that the Act should pass for one year, so that if the House of Lords threw out the Home Rule Bill, and if by any chance the Tories should come into power next year, the House would have the power of renewing the Bill. Otherwise, as he had said, there ought to be a very large accession to the Privy Council. There was really no necessity for passing the Act for more than a year. It was proposed to pass it for two years, and that, too, on the faith of its being properly exercised by a Liberal Government in whom they had confidence. It was possible, however, that the administration of the Act might pass into the hands of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), or into those of the Marquess of Salisbury; and they—the Nationalists—had no confidence whatever in them. He repeated that it would be only reasonable and fair to pass the Act for a year, and see how it worked, for then, if the Tories unhappily came into power, they would have the opportunity of retracing their ground, and criticizing the administration of the Act. The Lord Lieutenant was the Representative of the Queen in Ireland, and he failed to see why the Representative of the Isle of Thanet, Mr. Bruen, or Justice Lawson should have the powers conferred on them by the Act. There was an old saying, that “There’s as good fish in the sea as ever were taken out,” and there were as good men as those he named who would not have seats on the Privy Council. In fact, fresh blood was wanted in the Privy Council. He failed to see why so important an Officer as that of Privy Councillor should be conferred on men simply because they had served the Tory Party. The Tories always remembered their Friends, and made them Privy Councillors or something else; but the Liberals scarcely ever remembered their Friends, and never made any Members of the Privy Council, except those who had held high Office. The Tories were not such fools. When they were in Office they made magistrates as thick as blackbirds. They made Englishmen like the hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet Members of the Privy Council. The Tories, in fact, never forgot their Friends. He repeated, why did the Liberals, when in Office, forget their Friends; and why was it that the Tories never forgot them? So far as Ireland was concerned, the answer was plain enough. If the Government was afraid to trust the hon. Member for the City of Cork, let them, at least, appoint some of their political supporters. He would therefore move the Amendment standing in his name, and on a great number of grounds he hoped the House would accept it.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.), in seconding the Amendment, said, that it did not go far enough as far as he was concerned. It was the greatest possible humiliation to them that a Government for which they had a greater respect than they ever had for any English Government before should consider it necessary to renew this Act, which had been a source of great humiliation and annoyance to Ireland. Anyone who had lived in the country for the past five years would know how unnecessary it was to renew the Act, which was a most odious one. It was a most extraordinary phenomenon to notice the reasons put forward by the Government for the renewal of the Act. They admitted that it was not necessary to direct it against the National Party in Ireland, and they further admitted that it would be perfectly useless to put down or get rid of crime. Who, then, was the Act directed against? Why, against those who figured as the supporters of law and order in Ireland, and whose preposterous boast they had heard so much of. For himself, he had not the slightest fear himself of the bullying and brag of the Orangemen. He believed that if there were no Arms Act the Orangemen would sing very low. It should be remembered that when the Arms Bill was announced they blocked it. The Orange people thought to frighten the English into the idea that they would fight. According to the Chief Secretary, this Act would take the arms out of their hands; and he would ask honest English Members, who were frightened by the boastings and threats of war of the Ulster Orangemen, to notice how the Leaders of the

Orangemen in that House would vote on the Arms Act. They wanted to be disarmed so badly that they reminded one of the man who wanted so desperately to fight that he went to a policeman and said—"For God's sake take hold of me, or I'll kill someone." They wanted the House of Commons to take away their arms, and then they would pose before the English people as having been ready to fight, only, unfortunately, the Government had taken their arms from them. But there was another side to the picture, and it was that on account of the preposterous boastings of those gentlemen their country was to be placed under a degrading law, and the Nationalist Party had no security whatever that it would be honestly worked. It was because they believed that the Act would be used for the purpose of paving the way for those gallant warriors of the North of Ireland he opposed the Bill. Those men would be very ready, when they had guns and revolvers in their hands, to meet men who had no weapons at all. If a Tory Government came into power, they might disarm the Catholic populace and leave the Ulster Orangemen armed. If the Catholics were left unarmed and the Ulstermen armed, then he could answer for it that the Orangemen would be ready to take the field quick enough. There were numerous reasons why he objected to the Bill. In the first place, he regarded it as an unnecessary degradation; and, further, he thought it would have the very opposite effect to that which the Government, with perfect honesty, desired to see—namely, an end put to the disturbances in Ulster. He thoroughly believed with Bishop Berkeley that if a wall could be built round Ulster, and there be no English interference, all would be well. He was perfectly convinced that if there were no more Coercion Acts or Arms Acts, and no more interference by Englishmen, who incited the Orangemen or others in Ireland to turbulent proceedings, the Catholic and the Orangeman would lie down like the lion and the lamb together. All the disturbances they had seen of late had been due to outside interference. It was human nature that it should be so. It was a natural tendency, if men were left to live together and to practise neighbourly offices for themselves, they would be more happy and united than if they were interfered with or incited by people outside. Those of them who knew Ulster, and who lived in it, knew that, except at the Party anniversaries, any such Act as a Crimes Act was not needed. If, however, an Arms Act was to be passed in spite of all opposition, they were entitled to ask from the Chief Secretary some assurance that the Act was meant to be, and would be, used for the purpose for which it was asked. As the Act stood at present, it was singularly ill-fitted for that purpose. In the first place, it did away with the control of the Privy Council, and left the matter in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. He would rather see the Act made by that House to apply to the whole of Ireland, being made operative for only one year. He demanded that for the reason that the Nationalists had always found in the past, no matter what pledges were given in that House, that the Act was applied to the Southern and Nationalist, and not to the Northern and Conservative parts of the country. Again, the Court which was to deal with individual cases was a Court that rendered nugatory all hope of its being impartially administered. He objected to a Court constituted of "two or more Justices of the Peace sitting in Petty Sessions," and desired to have cases dealt with by one or more Resident Magistrates. A Court consisting of "two or more Justices of the Peace sitting in Petty Sessions" simply meant that the North of Ireland Catholics should have no arms, and the Protestants what they liked. Further, he submitted that the penalty of imprisonment for three months was a very severe punishment, and that the term ought to be shorter. Lastly, the power which the police had of arresting any person suspected of having arms should also be abolished, for it was a most humiliating and arbitrary power to put into the hands of the police. The whole question of renewing the Act had been brought about by the absurd proceedings of the Orangemen. Before the House went into Committee he thought they were entitled to call on the Chief Secretary to give them some information as to his views on these points—first of all, as to doing away with the Privy Council and substituting the Lord Lieutenant; next, as to extending the application of the Act to the whole of Ireland; thirdly, as to the constitution of the Courts; fourthly, as to the power to take away licences; and, fifthly, as to the reduction of the terms of imprisonment. He might say, in conclusion, that he thought some further power of appeal ought to be given, and clauses inserted for the guidance of the Courts as to the infliction of punishment, for at present a man might be imprisoned for having a rusty and useless flint gun, or even an old gun lock.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, no measure dealing with the disarmament of Orange districts will be satisfactory or impartially administered which requires to be put in force by a proclamation of the Irish Privy Council, composed almost entirely of members of or sympathisers with the Orange organisation,"—(Mr. T. M. Healy),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): In reply to my hon. Friend who has just spoken, I have to say that I do not suppose my views on the principle of the Arms Act are materially different to his; but I think that some of his remarks as to certain portions of the Act have been made under an entire misapprehension as to what is our duty now. The cases of imprisonment to which he referred were dealt with under the Crimes Act, and not the Arms Act, and that has been general since 1882. It should be remembered that this is nothing more than a mere Continuance Bill; and it is, therefore, very unusual to attempt to make any alteration in the original Act. It is true that I have put down an Amendment on the Paper, the effect of which is to modify a clause; but what the hon. Member proposes is to open up the whole Act that we are about to renew. That is altogether an inexpedient proposal, and one which we cannot entertain.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): On the revival of the Crimes Act it was proposed to renew the Alien Act of 1848.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: Very likely; but I was not in the House at that time. The Bill gives the Lord Lieutenant certain powers, and when he obtains the assent of the Privy Council he can, if he thinks proper, proclaim the two or three counties which are still left outside the provisions of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for South Derry (Mr. Healy) asked me to assent to the limitation of the expiring Act to one year. But that is a proposal to which I cannot assent. The hon. and learned Member rested his appeal to me on the ground that at the end of this year there might be a Conservative Ministry in our place. Well, Sir, we do not entertain any apprehension of the kind. We propose to renew the Act for two years; and I may add that this Act is not absolutely necessary for the purpose of dealing with the phenomena of lively times, referred to as possible, by the hon. Member, because there is ample power to deal with and put down riotous and violent assemblies. Objection has been raised to the Lord Lieutenant being called upon to consult the Privy Council before proclaiming a given district or county. I do not share in those objections. With regard to the constitution of the Irish Privy Council, I have had the matter looked into, and of the 42 Members, not including the Princes of the Blood Royal, the Commander of the Forces, and other officials, 23 are Conservatives and 20 Liberals.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: How many Nationalists are among them?

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: I had never thought that a Nationalist would accept the position of a Privy Councillor in Ireland. I believe that there are no Members of the Privy Council connected with the extreme Parties in politics. Therefore, it is not fair to describe the Privy Council as composed mainly, and almost entirely, of members of the Orange organization.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon; there is one Orangeman who is a Privy Councillor.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: Then I should say that was quite sufficient. The hon. and learned Member described to the House the manner in which Privy Councillors trooped to the august Chamber on occasions of great excitement in the country. I do not regard his description as at all accurate. I am the latest addition to the Irish Privy Council, and its Members are bound by an oath not to reveal what takes place on those occasions when the Privy Council meets. I believe, however, that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) did, on one occasion, disclose, or rather describe, what did take place at a meeting of the Irish Privy Council.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): No; I never did anything of the sort.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I am told you did give some sort of outline.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Certainly not.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Well, I was so informed; but I will pass that over. But I may say, without any breach, I think, of the secrecy imposed upon all Members of the Privy Council, that what happens at its meeting is very formal—is, in fact, purely formal. There is no notion of debate, or of Party division. No Party considerations are allowed to have weight at the meetings of the Privy Council. The hon. and learned Member for South Derry has referred to what might be expected to happen if a Privy Councillor in Ireland, holding the views of the hon. and gallant Member for Thanet (Colonel King-Harman), attended and expressed his views. But the hon. and gallant Member, if he were a Member of the Privy Council in Ireland, would no more think of attending its meetings than an English Privy Councillor would think of attending the meetings of the English Privy Council, unless he were summoned to attend. The Privy Council of Ireland has very important functions to perform in connection with the regulation of fairs, tramways, and fisheries. In all such matters it plays a tolerably active part. But in questions affecting the preservation of law and order it would be against practice, it would be against decency, and against all precedent for Privy Councillors to deny the powers which the Executive declared to be necessary for public order and public safety. The words of the Act are quite clear as to the terms and conditions under which any district may be proclaimed. Reference has been made to the fact that Belfast has been proclaimed. That is true; but Belfast was proclaimed under the Peace Preservation Act in 1873. The Peace Preservation Act is an entirely different measure to this. The Arms Act is a very little Coercion Act indeed compared with it, and yet the Privy Council did not resist the proclamation of Belfast, and the extension to it of the very severe provisions of the old Act. Therefore, on the grounds I have stated, I cannot at all accept the hon. and learned Member's account of the composition of the Privy Council, nor do I accept his view as to their performance of their duties, and I cannot comply with his request that he should so alter the Act as to enable the Lord Lieutenant to put in force the provisions of this Act without the advice of the Privy Council. But if there was not that strong reason for refusing what the hon. and learned Member asks, I should demur to opening up the provisions of the Act on a mere Continuance Bill. I may say, moreover, there have been very few complaints indeed of the manner in which the Arms Act has been administered. I have had very few complaints indeed of the way in which the Act works; and, under the circumstances, I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will allow us to go into Committee. I may, however, give him this undertaking—that if it should become necessary to put the Act in force, it will be administered with perfect fairness and impartiality. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) wants us to give an assurance that the Arms Act shall apply to all the ports of Ireland. The Act does apply to all ports. The importation of arms is permitted in 12 ports; but it will take place under the supervision of the Custom House officers and under very stringent regulations. The question of extending the Proclamations to all portions of Ireland engages the attention of the Government at this moment; and I am sure that the House will believe my assurance when I state that, on the least sign of disturbance breaking out, the Proclamation will be extended to those districts which are now exempt. The Government will, undoubtedly, and with promptness, resort to the powers they already possess.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) said, it was generally understood that, if the Bill was to apply at all, it was to apply to Ulster. Now, in three Provinces in Ireland there was really no necessity for such a measure as this, inasmuch as the people were practically all of the one mind, and there was very little chance of any collision of opposing Parties when they were nearly all of one way of thinking. As an Ulster Member, therefore, he

more than questioned the wisdom of any such measure as this; and as a Member for one of the counties where the Nationalist and Orange feeling was pretty well divided, he might be permitted to say that he was extremely sorry that the Government had not allowed the Bill to drop. He was afraid the general impression throughout the country produced by the renewal would be that the Government were really alarmed and frightened by the prospects which had been held out by certain people in Ulster about disturbances in that Province, and as a sort of proof that the language used predicting civil war was not altogether absurd, but that it was intended that something should really follow, and that it really meant something more than sound and fury. He believed that Nationalists and Orangemen alike would, if polled on the subject, be found to be dead against the renewal of the Bill. Now, in the county he represented—Fermanagh—the Nationalists undoubtedly were not armed. But the Orangemen were to a very great extent, and yet he believed the feeling of the Nationalists, both Protestants and Catholics, in that county would be in favour of dropping the Bill; and why? Because it was bound to engender a sort of bad feeling. Neighbours would, under such a measure, develop bad feelings of jealousy resulting from inequalities and injustice, and the Bill was calculated in that respect to do much harm. But, as a matter of fact, another reason why he objected to the renewal of the Bill was, that it certainly looked bad that that should be done at a moment when a Bill had been introduced, which would undoubtedly result in the permanent pacification of Ireland. Not only, however, was he opposed to the principle of the Bill, but he objected to the way in which it had hitherto been administered, and in which it was intended to continue to administer it. How could they expect people to look with equanimity upon an Act which relegated the power of deciding who should carry arms to those who were, in a great many instances, not only opposed to the people in sympathy and feelings, but who had openly expressed themselves to be so? He believed further that the Bill would put a premium on the possession of arms. It was a sort of Coercion Act, and would give colour to the idea that civil war was likely to take place. The Irish Party were opposed to the measure also, because of the fact that they did not anticipate very much fairness from the way in which it would be administered. In the Privy Council, the Nationalists were not represented; and it was no answer to say, that there were Liberals as well as Conservatives in that Body, and that there was only one Orange Privy Councillor. But one Orangeman there was quite enough to taint the lot. The fact that that Council had such power as they had under the Bill was quite enough to justify the opposition to it. There was not in Fermanagh one Justice of the Peace in sympathy with the Nationalists; and how could the people look with sympathy on the administration of the Act by men who were admittedly of anti-popular opinions? The most partizan magistrates, Orangemen of the most pronounced type, would be empowered to administer the Act, and to take arms out of Nationalists' hand and put them into Orange hands. Some time ago, Viscount Cole, a late Member of that House, and still a magistrate of Fermanagh, said he preached against Roman Catholics as a body, and that they should be exterminated and sent out of Fermanagh and into some other place. Was that a proper man to administer this Act? Another Orange magistrate was brought before his brother magistrates and fined for assault and battery; and another said that, under certain circumstances, the people would be justified in rising up against the law passed by that House. It was ridiculous, on the face of it, to say that such men should be intrusted with the administering of such an Act. If the Act must pass, well and good; but at least the alternative suggested should be adopted—namely, that the power of giving licences should be taken out of the hands of the local magistrates and given to the Resident Magistrates, the paid servants of the Crown. It would be better to make that concession than go to the country with the Bill as it now stood. Bitterness against the Government would result from the measure being left as it was. He would appeal to the Prime Minister—Was it a right and proper thing to allow men like Viscount Cole to decide, or have a voice in deciding, whether people should have arms—Viscount Cole who, as he stated, advised the extermination of Catholics—

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I rise to Order. Viscount Cole never used such an expression; he explained that he never used it.

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I say that Viscount Cole distinctly advised the extermination of the Roman Catholics.

MR. JOHNSTON: I deny it.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I defy contradiction, and if the hon. Gentleman, who is so distinguished in his Party, can prove the contrary, I will apologize humbly. Viscount Cole is a foolish sort of man, and not very much notice was taken of him at the time; indeed, someone told me that his Lordship was a lunatic. I would ask that the power be taken out of the hands of local magistrates known to be partizans, and given to the Resident Magistrates, and that certainly the local magistrates should not adjudicate in cases arising out of breaches of this law. How can a county like Fermanagh, where there is not a magistrate with popular sympathies, be expected to be contented with the administration of this Act by these men? One man said that, as a general rule, citizens were to obey the law, but that if the Home Rule Bill was passed, the people who happened not to like it should rise in arms against it; and in saying that he doubtless felt encouraged by the statements of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). All they asked was that the power of granting licences should be taken out of the hands of notoriously partizan men, and transferred to the paid magistrates of the Crown. The Nationalist Members had no fear whatever of civil war—the talk indulged in on the subject was all “bunkum,” led off by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, who incited the Orangemen of the North to revolt. If the Protestants of Ulster make up their mind to fight, they can do so, for they are sturdy and able men, and will make good soldiers; but I know sufficient of them to predict they will not fight unless the Irish Parliament passes some measure interfering with their rights or privileges, and that they will certainly not do. I hope, in conclusion, that the suggested alterations will be adopted.

Mr. William Redmond

MR. MITCHELL HENRY (Glasgow, Blackfriars) said, he was happy to support the hon. Member for Fermanagh (Mr. W. Redmond) in the appeal he had made. The measure could only be put into operation when a county was proclaimed, and if a county was proclaimed it ought to be done for some good reason, and the Government would always be careful to select competent men as Resident Magistrates. He considered the power should rest entirely with the Resident Magistrates. In a proclaimed district, the licence was to be granted by a Resident Magistrate; but, if he refused a licence, he could be compelled to grant it on a certificate of two magistrates that the applicant was a proper person to be intrusted with a licence. If, however, as he understood, the 4th clause was to be omitted, he did not see that there was very much to complain of; but, at the same time, he thought the Government was much to blame for not having made up their minds with respect to the Act long ago, and for not having brought it in at a time when it could have been fully considered, and when, if Amendments were to be made in it, they could have been made with the full assent of the House after proper discussion. Although the omission of Clause 4 would greatly improve the Bill, it would not make it completely satisfactory. As to the necessity of an Arms Act, he could not see how anyone knowing anything of Ireland could have the slightest doubt that such an Act was required. [“Oh, oh!”] He knew that before the present Act was passed, revolvers, muskets, and all other sorts of weapons were sold everywhere in large quantities openly, not merely in shops for the purpose, but even in drapers’ and grocers’ shops, it being maintained that every person should be armed. He thought it was highly necessary that some check should be applied to such a state of things. When the present Act was passed, the Government had to pay compensation to traders for the loss of the sale of their stock of arms, and he himself had procured compensation for some traders in the county of Galway. Since that time the Act had been in operation without there being, as far as he knew, any real ground of complaint against it.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Tyrone, S.) said, that to hear the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mitchell Henry) expressing any approval of what the Irish Party did, was perhaps to be regarded as a happy augury for their agreement on other and more important subjects. He (Mr. O'Brien) shared with his hon. Friend's regret that the Government were not able to make up their minds to discard the Arms Bill altogether. It did seem very odd that the Government should interrupt the debate on the Government of Ireland Bill to pass an Arms Bill. However, he was satisfied that, as the Chief Secretary said, he and they would not personally differ very much on the matter. The Chief Secretary had stated, and he agreed with him, that this was not so much a question of legislation, as of administration. Unfortunately, up to the present, the administration of the Arms Act, even in those districts in the North of Ireland where it was nominally in force, had been an absolute sham. He wished it to be thoroughly understood that neither to him nor his Friends would there be any hardship in the disarming of their fellow-countrymen in the North of Ireland. In the North of Ireland, the trouble arose not from the conduct of the farmers in the counties, but from the action of rowdies in the towns. It was they who were in possession of revolvers, and they would continue to be so until the Government did something to check the Orange magistrates, who had unlimited licence to keep arms, because it was, unfortunately, the Orange landlords who bought arms and distributed them. (Colonel WARING: Oh, oh!) He did not know if his hon. and gallant Friend had himself been generous in the matter of distribution; but it was perfectly notorious that the Orange landlords in the North were building Orange halls, and were equipping and keeping the whole thing going. In point of fact, the whole business in the North of Ireland was simply a landlord organization, with, he admitted, a certain sprinkling of Gentlemen like the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) — perfectly honest Gentlemen, but who, also, at certain seasons of the year, were not exactly models of political sanity. He held that the first condition of putting an end to rowdyism in the North of Ireland was to deal with the Orange magistrates and deprive them of any power whatever in the administration of the Act, not merely the power of giving certificates such as he was glad to say the right hon. Gentleman proposed, but any power whatever of interfering as magistrates, and doing what was one of the grossest scandals in Ireland—namely, sitting as magistrates in judgment on the misconduct of those who, by their own speeches, they had incited to outrage. If these landlords in the North were only once brought to their senses, and half-a-dozen resolute police officers sent to those troublesome towns when occasion arose, it would be extremely easy to deal with these revolver men without special measures at all. If the men in the South of Ireland went and displayed their arms, as was constantly done in the North of Ireland, and fired shots in the streets, the police would pounce upon them and take the arms from them. But why was not something of the kind done in the North of Ireland? But the police would not dream of doing such a thing. In his own constituency the police constantly stood by whilst shots were fired all about the streets. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman's best policy was to show these men that the Government would stand no nonsense, and that wherever arms were used in the streets, they would be seized, and the carriers of them punished. But the policy hitherto adopted in the administration of the Act was, when there was no disturbance, to refuse arms to one section and to grant them to another; and he was sure that the House would agree that there was no reason why a respectable man, a farmer, should be deprived of the right of having a shot gun. The law, if passed at all, should be administered impartially.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, he was by no means an out-and-out supporter of the Nationalist Party; but he thought they had much ground for the claims they were now advancing, and he should like to urge the Government to consider whether they could not meet them. The Resident Magistrates were men who, he assumed, would be acceptable to all parts of the House, and he thought that to them the decision should be given rather than to the local magistrates. Perhaps, if the Government would give the administration of the Act to the Resident Magistrates, the Irish Members would withdraw their opposition.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I have already explained that the Resident Magistrates and Constabulary Inspectors, purely official persons, are the only persons who have power to grant licences under the Proclamation, and to carry out the provisions of the Act.

MR. HOLMES (Dublin University) said, that from the first moment of the Session, when the question was brought forward, he, with the experience and knowledge of Ireland upon which he could form an opinion, was in favour of renewing the Act. An Act of the kind was certainly very useful for preventing collisions between opposing Parties in various parts of Ireland, its application not being confined, as he understood it was not to be confined, to one part of Ireland more than another. His experience in Irish Administration from 1877 to 1880, during which time a similar Act was in force, was, that the Act had a distinct effect in the way of checking the commission of outrages which were planned, but could not be carried out in some cases, owing to the want of arms; and in other cases, because of the inadequate nature of the arms made use of. Therefore, he thought it very desirable that this Act should be renewed. Had it been proposed that the Act should apply only to particular parts of the country, he should have resisted it; but he would point out that it applied to all parts of Ireland, because it was within the power of the Lord Lieutenant to extend it to any district where it was required. Some observations had been made by the hon. and learned Member for South Derry (Mr. T. M. Healy) as to the words "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," and he should not be doing his duty if he remained silent and did not protest against an attack upon a Body which had always discharged its duty in a spirit of fairness and justice. ["Oh, oh!"] No hon. Member who had taken part in that attack had instanced a single case where the Act had been put in force in a district where it could in justice be said that injustice was done to any one person. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Wexford was one.] The composition of the Privy Council was not of a one-sided character; it was largely composed of gentlemen who had always professed strongly Liberal opinions. True, there were no Nationalists on the Privy Council; but, so far as he could gather, Members of that Party were among the last who desired to have a seat on that Board. It was within the power of the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim any district in Ireland. All he was bound to do was to seek the advice of the Privy Council, but he was not hampered in any way, and, in the end, responsibility would rest with the Lord Lieutenant; but he was required, in order to have full consideration, to seek the advice of the Council; and surely it was desirable that an Act which involved considerable interference with ordinary liberties should not be enforced without as full a consideration as possible. Further, he entirely agreed with the Amendment that had been put on the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, dealing with the Licensing Authority. When hon. Members below the Gangway suggested that Orange magistrates should not be allowed to adjudicate upon the Act, he thought they were making a proposition which few could agree to. Suppose hon. Members below the Gangway had the government in their hands, were they to suppose they would deprive Orangemen of the Commission of the Peace? He understood hon. Members to say that there should be perfect equality between Orangemen and Nationalists. Personally, he knew very little of the Orange Society; but certainly, up to the present, he had heard nothing relative to its members that should disqualify them from the Common Law rights of Her Majesty's subjects. [An hon. MEMBER: Nobody wants to.] Very well; but why was it that the Act did not apply to parts of Ulster? It was because that there, as in other parts of Ireland, the Act had been fairly administered; and if districts in the North were not proclaimed it was simply because there were now no outrages there. As regarded the appointments to the Magistracy, or the administration of the law, he believed the Act would be put in force by the Chief Secretary fairly and equitably; and believing that the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman had suggested made the Act more valuable than before, and, in point of fact, brought it in harmony with the old Peace Preservation Acts, he would support the Bill.

Sir Julian Goldsmid

MR. J. E. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.) said, there was no provision in the Act that could prevent a man, with an evil intention, from obtaining the means to do and carry it out. If the use of arms were free and open, there would be a public spirit created, and an Act of this kind would be found to be as little wanted in Ireland as in England. If an Orangeman committed an outrage, he ought to be punished, just the same as a Ribbonman—who was of the same class—would be punished. They should make no distinction between Orange and Nationalist magistrates. All they sought was, that fair play should be done on both sides. Let both sides be punished if they committed outrages. He opposed these Arms Acts for the main reason that they were simply coercion, and coercion without the least possible ground to justify it. Men who used arms would use them, because they knew they would not be punished. It was well known that the administration of the Act would be partial. All this legislation was founded upon distrust of the Irish people and only created suspicion and distrust. While the Arms Act was in full force in Derry, a meeting of Catholics was going to be held at a hall in the town, when it was seized by Orangemen. The latter proceeded to the roof, and from there fired into the faces of the police for nearly half-an-hour. During that time, a number of Orange magistrates in the hall below made no effort whatever to stop the firing. Then, again, the 'Prentice Boys of Derry had certain cannon which were all removed just before the Arms Act was passed, and, rumour said, were secreted at the house of the Duke of Abercorn. The men who in these cases used arms did so because, in the first place, they knew that they would not be punished; and, in the second place, because they believed and knew that the administration of the law would be partial. It was only when the police were present in large numbers that a riot and shot firing took place. If any measure of success had been admitted to attend the Administration of Earl Spencer, it was that part in which he exercised the ordinary law. There were rowdies on both sides; but a remedy for the present state of things would be found if the Common Law were applied firmly in Ulster, and if the police exercised the same vigour there as they did in the South. As representing the Nationalist spirit in Ulster, he desired to say that the great majority of the inhabitants of that Province, Catholics as well as Protestants, were quiet, law-abiding, industrious people, who required no special legislation one way or the other. There was, indeed, a rowdy element, equally strong on both sides; but if the ordinary law were properly administered there would be far less disturbance.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said, he thought this measure distinctly came within the category of exceptional legislation. At the same time, it was perfectly consistent to insist that if they were to have legislation of this kind at all it should be fairly and impartially administered against both political Parties in Ireland. Up to the present time that had not been the case, for although the Government had possessed these exceptional powers in regard to the carrying of arms, they had been practically exercised for the purpose of keeping one portion of the community disarmed and at the mercy of the other political Party. An hon. Friend of his had described to the House his experiences of a political meeting held during the recent Election campaign. A local Orangeman came out to the meeting, in the presence of a large crowd, and presented a revolver at the crowd. He also described how the evidence was deposed by three independent witnesses, and how the prisoner charged with the offence practically made no defence—he examined no witnesses, and merely contented himself with stating that the weapon was not a revolver but only a pipe case. The result of the case was, that whereas the Resident Magistrate was in favour of a conviction, there were on the Bench half-a-dozen Orangemen who dissented, and in the end the prisoner walked off scot-free. In the face of these facts, he did not think that they were asking an unreasonable thing that some revision should be made in the tribunal of administering the Act. He thought the House would see that it would be a most deplorable thing that the administration of this Act should be left in the hands of the local magistrates, in whom it was practically vested. They would then have gentlemen sitting on the Bench to administer justice, whose object would really be to defeat the ends of justice. There was another point equally important — the question of the existing licences. In renewing the Act, he apprehended that the licences granted under the former Act would not cease to have effect. Now, the Irish Members complained that the tribunal which would have power to deal with the matter would be composed of the local Orangemen of the North, who would use that power to place arms in the hands of their friends. With the Orangemen of the North the possession of weapons was almost universal, as had been on several occasions proved to the House. The Amendment which had been placed upon the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to deal with this matter was practically illusory, for no provision was made enabling the Government to revoke the power exercised by magistrates of that class. Beyond that, those magistrates would not want that power, for they had already placed the arms in the hands of their friends. For himself, he would both move and support Amendments calculated to amend the law on the points to which he had already adverted.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, he had a very strong objection to this, as to all Coercion Acts, applied only to one part of the United Kingdom. Such repressive legislation was not desirable, and he was sure that a large majority in that House were sick of the constant discussions to which that class of legislation gave rise. He would, therefore, support any course of procedure which would tend to make it more difficult, thereby bringing it to a speedy end. The time of the House was wasted uselessly, and he did not think a much stronger argument could be used against it. If any justification were needed for the Government of Ireland Bill, it was to be found in the fact that this Bill was being brought forward by a Liberal Government. He sympathized with the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentlemen below the Gangway, and would vote for it.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin, S.), who rose amid cries of "Divide!" said, he would not occupy the time of the House many minutes. He merely rose to state that he, like his hon. Colleagues, regarded this as a Coercion Act, and he therefore felt it to be his duty to vote against it. There could perhaps be no stronger proof advanced of the necessity of granting Home Rule to Ireland, than the fact that these constant Coercion Acts proved that the legislation of the Imperial Parliament moved too slowly to enable them to rule Ireland justly. The Irish Members also objected to the administration of the Act under the present system. He would give the House one instance which came to his knowledge. In the county of Wexford, where he lived, there had not been a single agrarian outrage committed, nevertheless the Arms Act was applied there. A number of very respectable farmers asked him to try and obtain leave for them to keep guns for the protection of the crops on their property. He waited upon some of his then friends, the local magistrates, and asked them if they could see their way to give these men leave to keep guns. They informed him that these men "were Land Leaguers," and that weapons, therefore, would not be given to them. In the North of Ireland, almost every farmer had a gun, because the magistrates were Orangemen, and they would not refuse licences to men of the same Society. He thought that, in view of the possibility of a General Election coming on, it was very desirable to limit the supply of arms given exclusively to partizans. The working of the present Act had, however, amounted to this—that Catholics would not get arms, while Protestants would. He thought there were, therefore, strong reasons for opposing the Bill.

Question put.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title, agreed to).

Clause 2 Continuance of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 5).

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The object of the Amendment which I propose to move is to leave out "1888" for the purpose of substituting "1887." I do not think this Amendment will require much discussion. The object of the Bill is to continue the Peace Preservation Act of 1881; but as the Government have brought in a Bill to alter the Government of Ireland, and to give the people some share in it, one year ought to be long enough for the continuance of this repressive Act. The Act, as it stands, is a perfect sham. For the last 80 or 90 years there has existed in the North of Ireland a Party in ascendancy, who have been anti-national, and who are now distinctly disloyal, and it is through this Party that you propose to administer this Act against the Orangemen. The object of this Act has been to restrict the use of arms; but it has never succeeded in carrying out that object, and that is another reason why we should give it up as a sham. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will tell us how many searches have been made for revolvers and other arms under the 1st section of the original Act; and I should like further to know what arms, when discovered, have been forfeited; whether one single weapon in the whole town of Belfast has been seized under this Act, which has been in force now for five years, and which it is proposed to continue for the next two years? I do not believe that any arms have been seized, or ever will, and I am satisfied that this Act has only been laughed at in the North of Ireland. It would not prevent one Orangeman from going armed to a meeting, or prevent a single assassination or murder from taking place. Then, again, there is another point; this Act pretends to apply to armed assemblies, and these occur only in the North of Ireland. Why should it be extended to the whole of the country? I am certainly of opinion that the ordinary law, as it stands, is quite strong enough, and there is not the slightest pretence that there are any armed assemblies outside Ulster; and instead of being an Arms Act, it might be entitled an Act to enable the local magistrates to harass persons who are unpopular with them. For these reasons I should like to see the Act confined to one year; and I therefore propose, in line 9, to omit "eight," for the purpose of inserting "seven."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, to leave out "eight," and insert "seven." — Mr. Chance.

Question proposed, "That the word 'eight' stand part of the Clause."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I hope that the Chief Secretary will be able to give the Committee some information in regard not so much to the licences granted, as to the number of searches under the Act. We are told that this Act has been enforced in Ulster, and I want the right hon. Gentleman to tell us how many search warrants have been issued in that Province, what arms have been surrendered, and what number have been captured in Ulster? Before the Act is renewed, I think we ought to have a Return of the number of licences granted and revoked in Ulster, and the number of licences refused. I also trust that the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment which has been moved by my hon. Friend.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I may say that the town of Belfast was proclaimed in 1881, and has, therefore, been practically proclaimed ever since the Act has been in operation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But it has never been fully carried out.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I cannot tell the hon. and learned Member exactly how many search warrants have been issued in any particular part of Ireland; but I may say that in the first year of this Act between 700 and 800 warrants were issued, but only about 150 prosecutions took place. Certainly in a large majority of instances the search took place without finding arms. I cannot say how many revolvers, rifles, and guns there are in Belfast. I cannot answer that question offhand, but my impression is that in the North, since 1881, there have been considerable seizures of arms and surrender of arms. In the few remarks I made on moving that the House should go into Committee I dealt with the point of the limitation of the powers of the Act. I do not think it is reasonable to expect the Government to bring in an Act of this kind, if it is worth bringing in at all, and to limit its duration for a single year. Heretofore all Acts of this kind have been in operation for five years. We should be very sorry to bring in an Act for five years, but two years is so very short a time that I do not think any legitimate complaint can be made of the date; and, on the other hand, it would be childish to propose a renewal of the Act unless we did not make provision for it to be in operation for a reasonable time. We have considered, and we still consider, and I have heard no argument to the contrary, that two years are a reasonable time; and, therefore, I cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Member.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Chief Secretary has said that it has heretofore been the custom to bring in an Act of this kind for five years; but surely this is the last Act of this description that is likely to be brought forward for a good many years, and I think it would be advantageous to fix a shorter period. I have a distinct recollection of moving a similar Amendment in regard to the last Arms Act, and I remember a speech of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt), in which the right hon. Gentleman stated as a reason for enacting it for five years that in olden times it was the practice to pass Acts of the same kind for only one or two years, and there was a Parliamentary understanding among hon. Members that they would always be renewed when it became necessary, but at the time referred to by the right hon. Gentleman there was such a strenuous opposition to the enactment of repressive measures of this kind that he found himself obliged to extend the period from one or two years to five years. I have a distinct recollection of that speech, and I know that it was on an Arms Act and not a Coercion Act. That reason has now altogether disappeared, and the Government cannot complain that they are afraid of anything like obstruction to the passing of this Bill. They have been able to bring it in and to pass the second reading, and in view of the very much larger and more important measure for the Government of Ireland now before the House, we have not offered the Government any practical resistance or put them to any trouble. I think the Government ought to take that fact into account, and return to the old plan of renewing the Act for such period only as is absolutely necessary. Instead of taking the maximum I think they ought to take the minimum, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer having declared that a period of five years was necessary on account of the difficulty of passing a Bill, now that there is no such difficulty it would certainly be better for the Government to renew this Act for one year. If, unfortunately, we should next year find ourselves in the same position, and a friendly Government should deem it necessary to bring in a Bill again for renewing the Act for another year, although they may undoubtedly expect the same amount of opposition and division which the present Bill has received, there would be nothing like factious opposition offered to it. Seeing that we have virtually dropped our opposition and have given the Government a very small amount of trouble, I think we ought to be treated leniently. I do not see why the Government should endeavour to enforce this Bill for a longer period than is absolutely necessary, and if we get from them that larger measure which we hope for, this Bill will not be required at all. I therefore support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance).

Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has objected to arguments being put forward similar to those which were used in discussing the second reading of the Bill. Now, I submit that there may be many reasons urged for the alteration of the clause which also affected the second reading of the Bill, and I must maintain that the arguments which were used both upon the first and second reading of the Bill can be urged now with much greater force for the alteration of this clause. One reason for the alteration of the date of expiration is that the Bill may have the effect of depriving a good many tenant farmers of their shot guns, and thus render it impossible for them to protect their crops. Therefore, the Act ought to be in operation for as short a time as possible. If it is to be in operation for two years, it would leave their crops unprotected and practically destroyed for that length of time, whereas if it is only renewed for one year, only one-half of the damage would take place. Then, again, it is not desirable that the unequal administration of Acts like this should be enforced for a longer period than is absolutely necessary. Very frequently it is a source of much inconvenience. I can give a case in point which occurred with regard to myself. Some years ago, being in the habit of travelling, I applied for a licence to carry a revolver, as I was often in possession of large sums of money; but although I represented all the facts, the magistrates of Cork refused me a licence, although I have known them give licences to bailiffs and others who were employed in instituting most obnoxious proceedings. In West Cork, Messrs. Payne and Barrett gave licences to bailiffs of notoriously bad character, who were known to have threatened innocent men passing to and fro; yet these magistrates, who then had the administration of the Act, will still retain the power of granting licences to persons of notoriously bad character, while they can deprive other persons, who really require them for their own safety and protection, of the right of carrying arms. Unhappily, great favouritism is displayed in the administration of the Act, especially in the North of Ireland, and, therefore, the arguments which were advanced on the second reading of the Bill may be applied with much greater force to an alteration of this clause. There are other points which might be advanced, but I think it would be better to reserve them until we come to discuss the other parts of the Bill. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will see the necessity of giving way on this point, and that he will have the Bill altered so that the Act will be in operation only for 12 months instead of two years.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I trust that my hon. Friend will press this point as to the duration of the Bill being confined to one year. The Chief Secretary has given us assurances; but I look with some misgiving on the character of the assurances given by the right hon. Gentleman. So far as the present Government are concerned, I have every confidence in them; but, at the same time, long and bitter experience makes men wary, and we know in the past how these Acts have been administered. It is within the bounds of possibility that the present Government may be succeeded by a Tory Government, who would thus have to administer the Act; and I cannot help regarding the fact with suspicion that the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Sanderson) will vote for the Bill. The Chief Secretary may say that he is not responsible for that, and that he is determined to carry out the provisions of the Bill impartially; but the hon. Members I have mentioned do not mean anything of the kind, or they would not vote for the Bill. I do not speak so much for the hon. Member for South Belfast, but certainly that remark applies to the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh. Nobody can say that our opposition to this measure has been of an obstructive or an unreasonable character; on the contrary, we have been very moderate, considering what an Arms Act is, and I think we have afforded good ground for saying that, considering the uncertainty of the future, it is not necessary to pass a Bill for so long a period as two years. I have no doubt that the present Government will be in Office this time 12 months; but it is impossible to insure that, and what we say is that the Representatives for Ireland should have another opportunity of criticizing the way in which the Act may have been administered. Irish Members can have very little doubt as to what the character of the action of a Tory Government, largely influenced by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), would be in the administration of such an Act. I cannot conceal from myself an uneasy feeling at what the prospects would be if the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) and his Party were in power in the North of Ireland. We want to take every precaution that the horrible policy of coercion which has been carried out so long in Ireland shall be brought to an end, and that no direct encouragement shall continue to be given to religious animosity and hatred in the North. The system of placing arms in the hands of one section and disarming the other undoubtedly has a tendency to keep up persecution and bad blood on one side and animosity on the other. What we say is this—first of all, that the system should be placed on such a footing that it may be entirely done away with. We have no fear of the Protestants of Ulster; but if the Government will not be advised by us, then the next best thing is to disarm everybody. There was one observation which fell from the Chief Secretary just now which confirmed me in the view I entertain. The right hon. Gentleman said Members might feel satisfied that if the necessity arises this Act will be put in force. Now, there are various portions of Ulster which are not proclaimed, in which the Orangemen are openly arming themselves. Is this to be allowed until they may actually take the field? I noticed a meeting of the Grand Lodge of Armagh the other day at which the different Masters of the Orange Lodges were called upon to hand in a statement as to the number of men they could place in the field. It was stated that in 11 towns in the Northern Division of Armagh there were 750 men ready to take the field if the necessity arose. Surely, in the face of a declaration of that nature, an Arms Act of this kind should be put in force. The right hon. Gentleman admits that this Arms Act would be of very little use for the prevention of outrages, and what, therefore, is the necessity which can arise for putting the Act in force? I do not see what cause there can be, unless these men go into the open field prepared to resist Her Majesty's Forces or the police, in which case the Government would only see the danger when too late to put the Act in force in any proper spirit. If they want to prevent mischief of that character, the proper time is to disarm these men when they are getting the arms and preparing for the field, always provided that the Catholics are not disarmed while licences to carry arms are issued to Protestants. In that case it would be too late, and for this reason—One of the objects they have is to produce effect upon public opinion in England, and if they are allowed to assemble in large numbers until they can be surrounded by Her Majesty's troops and disarmed, their object of impressing the people of England with the fact that they are prepared to carry on a civil war will be achieved. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman says that the Act will be put in force should the necessity arise, we are justified in entertaining the suspicion that in special circumstances the Act may not be used in the same way it has been used before, and I certainly do not see any good reason why the Act should be renewed for two years instead of one. If the Act is used in Ireland in a fair and impartial spirit, and there are good grounds for renewing it next year, the opposition of the Irish Members will be even of a milder character than it is now. (On the other hand, if the Act is unfairly enforced, or it is possible that a Conservative Government is in Office, it may be necessary that we should give it our determined opposition, and I do not see what objection the Government can have to such a course. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to imply that pressure might be brought to bear on the authorities to carry out the Act. What is the reason why certain counties in Ulster have not been proclaimed? There may be very little agrarian outrage in Down or Antrim, but we know very well that large bodies of armed men have attended political meetings in those counties, that they have discharged revolvers in the air, and flourished their arms. I know of one case of a meeting in the county of Down, where a large body of armed men went from Belfast with the avowed intention of firing at the Nationalists. A more audacious and open violation of the law I never saw or heard of in the course of my experience. These men left Belfast with the avowed purpose of breaking up a peaceable meeting. They were 300 or 400 in number, and every man among them had a revolver in his pocket. They hunted us, led by two magistrates, and they pursued me personally with cries of "Let's have a shot at Dillon." As I say, they were led by two magistrates of the county of Down, and Mr. Clifford Lloyd, who afterwards became very obnoxious to the Nationalist Party, saved my life on that occasion. Two magistrates at the head of 200 armed men demanded the rights of way. Mr. Clifford Lloyd told them to stand back in the Queen's name, and it was not until that occurred that they gave way. Yet these are the men who are to set in judgment on actions of this kind in the county of Down. I venture to say that the people of North Down are no different to-day from what they were at the time to which I refer. I have no objection to the Act being enforced so long as it is enforced impartially; and if I can be assured that it will be applied impartially to all classes of the people who display a spirit of turbulence or desire to obtain the possession of arms for an improper purpose, I would be content to confine my opposition to a mere vote against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. HANDEL CONSHAM (Bristol, E.): My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he mentioned that in the first year of the Act from 700 to 800 warrants were issued, added that there had only been 150 convictions. [Mr. JOHN MORLEY: Prosecutions.] It is quite evident, therefore, that the powers of the Act were only put in force for the purpose of annoyance; and, therefore, I think the shortening of the duration of the Bill becomes a matter of considerable importance. No one can pretend, after the statement made by the Chief Secretary, that the Act may not be used in such a way as to produce a most demoralizing effect upon Her Majesty's subjects. What would be thought if 750 houses were searched in England on charges of theft, and only 150 prosecutions followed? Would it not be said that the law had been put in force for an improper purpose? I confess that in listening to these debates nothing has been so disappointing to me as to notice the angry feeling which seems to be engendered by the proceedings of the Orange Party in the North of Ireland. I trust that by getting rid of the whole of this repressive legislation, we shall be able to produce a better feeling between the Protestant and Roman Catholic population in Ireland.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I will give the Committee the whole of the figures. In 1881 the number of warrants issued was 793; in 1882, 439; but in 1883 the search warrants were reduced to 37; in 1884 to 29; in 1885 to 6; and in the course of the present year there has not been one.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberne): I shall feel it my duty to support the Amendment, and I do so on a general broad principle. I think that coercion is at all times detestable, and if there is one line which I take more than another it is that all Liberal Representatives should steadily vote against coercion. So far I have voted against this Bill, and upon the same ground I shall continue to vote for the minimization of its operation as far as possible. Apart from the considerations laid before the Committee by the hon. Member for East Mayo Mr. Dillon, and others, it seems to me almost incredible that the Government cannot see their way to acquiesce in the views and appeals which are made to them by hon. Members from Ireland. At this moment, when the Government are basing their appeal for support to their Home Rule policy on the broad principle that we should put confidence and show trust in our Irish fellow-subjects, it is only right that on a small question like this we should show our trust by confining the operation of the present Bill to one year. If we continue to display a want of trust in them, I must admit that we supply the Conservatives on the other side of the House with a very good argument against our Home Rule policy. They may very fairly retort upon us that if we show so much distrust of the Irish people in connection with an Arms Bill how can we intrust them with the far larger power of self-government proposed to be conferred upon them by the Government of Ireland Bill? There is another argument which induces me to think that one year would be sufficient for continuing the operation of this Bill, and it is that by the time that period will have elapsed I think we may take it for granted that there will be a Home Rule Parliament in Dublin, and if the Irish people then find that they require an Arms Act they will be able to pass it for themselves. I have, however, sufficient confidence in the peaceable and law-abiding principles of the people of Ireland to feel sure that there will be no necessity whatever for any such measure. I therefore intend to vote with the Irish Party and against the Government, because I am glad to take the opportunity of voting against any extension of the principle of coercion. I also entertain some doubt as to the spirit in which the Act is likely to be administered. In Ireland there are two classes of magistrates, some of whom are paid, while the rest, who form by far the largest number, are not paid. Those who are not paid have already made themselves obnoxious for the partial mode in which they have administered the Act, and we certainly cannot depend on them to administer the Act fairly and uprightly. The instances which have already been given prove conclusively to every impartial mind that justice is not to be expected from the unpaid magistracy, and under those circumstances I cannot conscientiously vote for extending beyond the barest possible limits the authority which is now given to them under the Act. I think there can be nothing more calculated to disturb our relations with Ireland, and to render nugatory that pacification which the Prime Minister is trying to bring about, than the difficulties which are likely to arise from the unfair and undue administration of a Coercion Act of this kind. I certainly fail to see the necessity of continuing the operation of the Act for more than one year; and if the Irish Members desire to have the Act extended to the whole country let it be so extended. We should then know exactly where we are; but I would never give my consent to the administration of an Act of this kind, of a character which I abominate, by persons upon whose uprightness and fairness I cannot rely for its just and faithful administration. Nor can I give my sanction to the extension of that kind of legislation for a longer period than is absolutely necessary. Upon these grounds, I would earnestly appeal to the Chief Secretary to consider if it is not possible to accede to the appeal now made to him by the Irish Members. I am certainly not going to indulge in the argument which, though used on the opposite Benches, would, coming from this side of the House, seem to be little less than an insult to hon. Gentlemen opposite—that the Irish Members have lately been so well-behaved. I think that they have always been well-behaved, so long as they have been fairly treated; but that argument having been advanced, I think we should add what small amount of influence we and our Radical Friends possess in urging upon the Chief Secretary to limit the duration of the measure to the smallest period possible.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): I would also venture to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to minimize the duration of the Bill as much as possible. I would suggest that the Bill should only remain in operation until the end of the Session next year, and then, if necessary before the close of next Session, there would be ample opportunity for bringing in a new Bill. If I remember rightly, it is the custom to bring in a Continuance Bill every year, which is made to include a number of Bills that are only passed for one year. The figures which have been given by the right hon. Gentleman prove conclusively that, as a matter of fact, the Bill has almost gone out already. Last year there were only six search warrants issued, and this year, up to the present date, there has not been one. What is the real object of forcing a Bill of this kind through Parliament if it is entirely inoperative and not required? Upon that ground alone I think the suggestion I make would be a sensible way of settling the matter. Another point was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon)—namely, the parade which is made by certain classes in the North of Ireland of their desire to obtain arms. We see constant statements of the importation of arms and their distribution among the Orangemen; but I do not believe a word of it. We are told that 11,000 rifles were sold recently at 8s. a-piece. Probably 8s. would be the real worth of the article, and I am afraid that this description of arms would be a great deal more dangerous to the persons who attempted to use them than to their opponents. At the same time, if the Arms Act is to be enforced at all, I think a good reason has been urged for shortening its duration—namely, that at the present moment the law is unfairly administered. We know that in the Orange districts the persons who are likely to have these arms belong to the artizan class; and, in the next place, we know that the magistrates who will have to adjudicate in any of the cases prosecuted under the Act are prepared to perjure themselves in the most unblushing manner, so far as their oath of office is concerned, in favour of any persons who may be brought before them, in whose religious hatred and political objects they strongly sympathize. It has almost been the universal experience that there has been a failure of the administration of justice on the part of the Tory landlords in the North of Ireland, and that they act even worse in regard to a criminal case than they would in a civil prosecution where a political opponent was brought before them. I think that the Government should take the administration of the Act into their own hands, and should insist, in the strictest manner, that if the law is put in force at all, it should be administered impartially. It is notorious that in matters connected with political or religious feeling the persons who are prosecuted are never brought up before those who would firmly administer the law. In my opinion, the Resident Magistrates ought to have the entire power in their own hands, for the simple reason that they are paid officers, and are more or less amenable to the Government of the day. I am satisfied that the Chief Secretary, even of a Tory

Mr. Conyngham

Government, would not be so willing to act in such a partial manner as these unreasonable, unpaid magistrates. A fair illustration was given to-day of the spirit which animates these unpaid magistrates in the case of Mr. Brook, in regard to whose conduct a Question was put. There are hon. Members of this House who have been condemned to the plank-bed for using language of a much milder and less outrageous character than this man Brook. It must be remembered that this Justice of the Peace is charged with the administration of the law, and I was certainly surprised at the attempt which was made by the Chief Secretary to minimize the offence of Mr. Brook and to exaggerate the amount of apology he had made. He has also, I am sorry to say, been screened by the Lord Chancellor. If the Government would do their duty, Mr. Brook and a few more of the same class would be at once struck off the Commission of the Peace, and the people of the North of Ireland would then have some idea that it is really intended to administer the law in a spirit of impartiality. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will adopt the suggestion I have thrown out, the old custom could be resorted to, at the close of next Session, of including this Act in a Continuance Bill, and the Irish Members would then have an opportunity of offering an opinion whether or not it ought to be renewed for another year. They will be deprived of that opportunity if the Act is passed now for two years. Whatever Government may be in power next year, there ought to be an opportunity afforded to the Irish Members of discussing whether the law has been fairly and honestly administered.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I should like to point out that there is some misapprehension on the part of my hon. Friend below the Gangway on this side of the House Mr. Conybeare) as to the persons by whom this Act is to be administered. My hon. Friend said that it is at present administered by the unpaid magistracy. That is not the case. The granting of licences is not intrusted to the unpaid magistrates at all; but it is universally reserved to some high officer of the Constabulary Force, or to the Resident Magistrate. The unpaid magistrates have no power either to grant or refuse or revoke a licence to carry arms.

Sub-section 4 of Clause 4 of the Act does give a certain amount of power to the ordinary Justices of the Peace; but that sub-section I propose, with the assent of the Committee, not to continue. As to the date of the duration of the Act, two years is, in my opinion, a very reasonable time. At the same time, as has been pointed out by the hon. Member for West Cavan (Mr. Biggar), I admit that the fact of the Act expiring on the 1st of June has been found from experience, and is proved by what is taking place at this moment, to be a rather inconvenient period; and, therefore, upon reflection, I am prepared to assent to this arrangement—that the Act should be continued, not for two years, but until the 31st of December, 1887. That is the proposal I am prepared to make.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has just stated, that these licences are granted by the Resident Magistrates; but I wish to point out that it is the ordinary magistrates who have to try persons for breaking the law, and who, it is notorious, will not convict in the case of an Orangeman charged with an offence under the Act. What is the use of placing in the hands of the Resident Magistrates the power of saying to anybody in the county—"You shall not carry arms," when if such person breaks the law he is brought up for trial, not before the magistrate who has the power to give or deny authority to carry arms, but before an unpaid magistrate, who will refuse to convict him? If you require the trial for carrying arms to take place before the Resident Magistrate also, no doubt justice would be done. What is the case now? In Ulster you have Resident Magistrates to whom all applications for carrying arms must be made. If a licence is refused, the man carries arms all the same. If he is prosecuted for breaking the law, he is brought up for trial before those whom he knows from experience, and whom both the present Chief Secretary and the late Chief Secretary have more than once admitted, will not convict. Under these circumstances, with an Orange conspiracy going on throughout the whole of Ulster, your Act becomes a mere dead letter, while in the law-abiding parts of the country it is carried out to the full spirit. I altogether fail to understand why the Act should be renewed for two years. The Amendment is to continue it in operation for one year only, and I think that period is amply sufficient. The whole cry about an Orange rebellion is mere bunkum, and I cannot understand how any man of common sense can attach the slightest importance to it. Probably the Government may have been influenced to some extent by what these Orange Gentlemen may have declared, both in and out of this House; but if they will fairly investigate the matter, they cannot fail to see how ridiculous the whole thing is. All these cries are got up for the purpose of producing a false feeling of alarm. The other day we were told by an hon. Member of this House—a Grand Master, or some other kind of Master, of an Orange Lodge—that Lord Wolseley and the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) had both declared that if the Government of Ireland Bill passed, they would resign their commissions and take the field at the head of an Orange Army. Both of these noble and gallant Lords have publicly given the lie to that statement; but, nevertheless, the effect which such kind of statements is intended to produce continues to be propagated. The Orangemen still stick to the threat, although the lie direct has been given to it by Lord Wolseley and the noble and gallant Lord the Member for East Marylebone. Only last week a further statement appeared in The Belfast News Letter. It contained a piece of information, which, of course, nobody believed, that, in addition to an Orange Army which is to march upon Dublin, a second Army was to garrison the strong places in Ulster, and there was to be a third Army employed as an Army of Observation. This statement was, of course, copied into the English newspapers. I hardly know where the Army of Observation is to be employed—probably on the banks of the Shannon, which are overflowed for nine months in the year. One of the leaders of this great Army is a learned friend of mine, a barrister like myself, who sits with me at table in the same mess in the Middle Temple Hall; he is an officer neither of Militia nor Volunteers, and he has never even acquired the rank of an efficient in the Reserves. Take another distinguished leader—the hon. and gallant Major—who is a Member of this House (Major Saunderson). He is, I believe, in the Militia, and was for a short time in the Army; but neither in the one Service nor the other did he ever hear a shot fired in earnest. These are the Armies and these the leaders who are to march upon Dublin, are to garrison the strong places in Ulster, standing up to their knees in the mud of the Shannon, are to act as an Army of Observation, and to give battle to Her Majesty's Forces. I trust they will be able to realize how in Ireland we laugh at this kind of stuff—mere bunkum and twaddle—which the Orangemen attempt to cram down the throats of the British public year after year, but which has had the effect of bringing us under the influence of Coercion Acts. I recollect the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket)—a barrister like myself—declaring at the time of the passing of the Irish Church Act that he was prepared to seal his opposition to the measure in his blood. Nonsense like this has been crammed down our throats year after year, and the consequence has been Coercion Bills. If hon. Members will only look at the matter from a common-sense point of view, they must see that an Arms Act is of no use in Ulster so long as it is left in the power of the Orange magistrates to carry it out. If it were impartially administered in Ulster, not 14 days would elapse before a fine was imposed upon the three leaders of the mighty Orange Armies of Ulster by whom we are threatened. Personally, I should not care if there were 20 Arms Acts in the country; on the contrary, I think that those who do not know how to use arms properly ought to be deprived of them; but I think it a national insult to impose exceptional legislation of this character upon the people of Ireland; and it is all the more painful because it is forced upon us in consequence of the action of the three leaders of these bunkum Armies. The whole of this feeling will not live for three weeks after the passing of the Government of Ireland Bill. In the case of the Act for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church it lasted only three weeks. These periodical outbursts of insanity in Ulster are very much like the attacks of intermittent fever; it is their stock-in-trade, and their only stock-in-trade. If I had any certainty that you were going to carry out this Act properly in Ulster, or in the whole of Ireland, I should have no very strong objection to it; but what I do think is, that in putting on this extra year the Government are making it a greater insult to us. I would, therefore, ask the Chief Secretary if it is not possible to limit it to one year, or even to a shorter period, and not keep it longer, as a kind of favour to these insane Gentlemen of the Province of Ulster?

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): I suppose that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary intended to meet us half-way by proposing that the Act should only remain in force until the end of 1887. But that is scarcely half-way. The matter will have to be dealt with towards the end of 1887—before the close of the year—and, therefore, I think we should gain as much by allowing the Act to last to the end of the Session as to the end of the year. Suppose the consideration of the possible renewal of the Act occupied the last day of next Session, and that we sat until the end of September. I wish the right hon. Gentleman to give his special attention to this point, because none of us in this quarter of the House wish that this discussion should be at all protracted. If he will say he would be satisfied that the Act should only remain in operation until the end of the Session of 1887, or until, say, the 1st of September, I think my hon. Friend Mr. Chance would be prepared to accept the compromise—anything short of that would be of no practical good. With regard to the operation of the Act, no doubt the point as to the punishment for breaches of the law is far more important than the question of licensing, therefore I desire to press on the right hon. Gentleman the importance of stopping the discussion upon this question by limiting the operation of the Act, if not for quite one year, to the end of the Session of 1887, or to a month beyond. I do not wish to detain the Committee, or to urge arguments which have been urged with force by every speaker on these Benches; but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that I have not only no sympathy with the carrying of arms by Orangemen, or by any other class of the people, but that I would rather there was an Arms Act, if it were worked so as to prevent any people carrying arms for the purpose of committing outrage. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to bring this discussion to a close by consenting to limit the operation of the Act to the end of next Session.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I do not propose to trouble the Committee for more than a moment or two; indeed, there are only two points to which I wish to address myself. I understand the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) to suggest that the Act should only remain in operation until the end of the next Session of Parliament; and I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to practically adopt the suggestion. The end of the Session being an uncertain time, and it being impossible to put such words into an Act, I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would take it for the 31st of December, 1887, so that, if it had to be renewed, it would, as a matter of course, have to be renewed some time before the Session expired. And the hon. Member for South Monaghan (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) suggests that the Act should only remain in force till the end of the Session, or a month after. I think it is hardly necessary to persist in a discussion simply on a question of a day or two. I trust the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chance) will withdraw his Amendment, and accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I think there is substantial objection, although I do not quite see how the matter can be remedied at the moment, to the administration of this Act by others than Resident Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, by an Amendment which he has suggested, takes away from the mere Justices of the Peace the power they had of arming their own friends despite the Resident Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, however, only deprives the Justices of the Peace of the right to give certificates of fitness to possess arms. If it were possible—I do not know whether it is possible in a Continuing Act—by some simple words to confine also to Resident Magistrates the power of adjudicating upon offences under this Act, the spirit of the modifications which have already been initiated by the Government would be carried out to the end. If it be possible to make this alteration, I venture to appeal to the Chief Secretary to bring it about.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The modification suggested by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) will be proposed by one of my Colleagues on a section which will come up for discussion subsequently. I think the compromise which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has offered to us is a very fair one; and, therefore, with the permission of the Committee, I will withdraw my Amendment, and move to insert the words "thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, lines 8 and 9, to leave out the words "first day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight," and insert the words "thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven."—(Mr. Chance.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Mr. Courtney, the Amendment I have to propose refers to the issuing of licences, and its effect will be, practically, to cancel every existing licence, and to render necessary the issuing, under this Act, of new licences. In my opinion, the Amendment is a necessary corollary to the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has himself put upon the Paper, and I will briefly state the reasons why. The Committee is aware there has been frequent reference to the fact that the existing Act which this Bill is to renew contains a provision that the Licensing Authority is bound to issue a licence to any occupier of agricultural land, if two local magistrates certify he is a fit and proper person to have a licence given to him. This provision is to be found in Sub-section 4 of the original Act, and the point is that the Licensing Authority had no option whatever left in its hands when once a certificate was asked. Now, Sir, we complain that, under this sub-section, licences were issued wholesale to persons who ought not to have had them. We complain that, all over the North of Ireland, local Orange magistrates made use of this provision to place arms in the hands of their friends and partizans. We complain, Sir, that the effect of that was the scenes which were witnessed at a great many of the political meetings which have been held during the past two months throughout the whole of the North of Ireland. Large bodies of armed men came to those meetings. The men did not merely carry the weapons, but they used them for the purpose of giving emphasis to the political opinions which they met to demonstrate. I say, further, that practically the Government have admitted the justice of our complaints by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has given Notice of an Amendment taking the power out of the hands of the local Justices, and leaving the issuing of the licences solely in the hands of the responsible Licensing Authority. What I wish to impress on the Committee and on the right hon. Gentleman is that the concession he suggests will be perfectly illusory unless it is made operative by such an Amendment as I now propose, because our case is that, under the existing law, every person in the North of Ireland whom the Orange magistrates thought it right to give arms to has already got arms. The right hon. Gentleman's concession will be perfectly illusory if the arms are left in the hands of the people who so improperly obtained them. In order to give practical effect to the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, and to undo the evil work which has, admittedly, been done under Sub-section 4 of the original Act, whereby the Orange magistrates armed all their friends and partizans, it is absolutely necessary that some re-inquiry should take place into those cases in which licences already exist. It may be said, in reply to me, that the Lord Lieutenant has already the power to revoke any licences improperly issued; but I maintain that a power of that kind is a practically useless power, because for its exercise it is necessary that a distinct Proclamation shall be issued in every individual case, which Proclamation is to be published in The Dublin Gazette, or otherwise promulgated as Proclamations usually are. It would be most invidious to issue these Proclamations. Direct attention would be drawn to each individual in respect of whom the licence was revoked, and obstacles would be placed in the path of the inquiry, which I say is absolutely necessary in cases in which magistrates have already issued licences under the existing Act. I respectfully press upon the Government the necessity of accepting this Amendment. There can be no question that the existing law has been grossly abused by the issue, wholesale, of revolvers to the Orangemen of the North, and to the other partizans of the Tory Party. The men of whom I speak are fully armed, armed to the last man, and they display the fact most ostentatiously on every possible occasion; they do so by coming armed to their political meetings, and by using their arms to making the holding of political meetings disagreeable to their political opponents.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, to leave out the words "and licence."
—(Mr. M. Healy.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne)): I presume that the object of the hon. Member in moving this Amendment is to secure a revocation of all existing licences, to be followed, as far as is thought necessary, by the issue of other licences. That is a very great innovation on the spirit and scope of the Bill. Upon the question of revocation I may say that the Lord Lieutenant has already power, under the 2nd section of the Act, of setting forth by Proclamation the conditions and regulations under which the carrying of arms is authorized; and he does, in his Proclamations, take power of revocation to himself. Therefore, there is without this Amendment power, if the Lord Lieutenant thinks fit, to revoke all licences now in existence. The hon. Gentleman wishes, as I understand him, that power to be transferred from the Lord Lieutenant to the Licensing Authority.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: My Amendment would have this effect—that the expiry of the existing Act on the 1st of June and the passing of this Act would cancel all existing licences.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: That is a very drastic and far-reaching Amendment, involving as it does, of necessity, a complete re-issue of licences. I understood from the speech of the hon. Member that the object of himself and Friends is to secure for the Licensing Authority the power of revocation. I cannot for a moment accept such an Amendment; it will lead to a break up of all existing arrangements, and necessitate a complete reconsideration of those arrangements. It must not be supposed that it is intended the Act shall apply to one particular part of Ireland only. The object of the Act is to prevent the aggravation of political feeling, which usually runs high in Ireland, and which, for some time, is likely to run even higher than hitherto by the practice of carrying arms. That being the case, and the view and object for which the Act is framed, it is impossible that we can consent to let go by one single Amendment the whole existing set of arrangements. I must offer a resolute resistance to the Amendment.

Mr. HOLMES (Dublin University): It seems to me that the Amendment now before the House is one of a very extraordinary character. The Act now in existence is one which goes on the general understanding that the people of Ireland are entitled to bear arms; but that, under certain circumstances, restrictions may be imposed on them under Proclamation issued by the Lord Lieutenant in Council. The present measure is a renewal Bill, and it provides that when the Act is passed the various Proclamations now in force, placing restrictions on various parts of the country, shall continue in force, so as to prevent the necessity of issuing new Proclamations. And as a natural and perfectly logical consequence, when you continue the Proclamations in this way, you should also continue the exceptions that have been granted in the shape of licences for the carrying of arms. I can understand hon. Gentlemen pleading against coercion contending that there ought to be new Proclamations and orders under a new Act; but I cannot understand why, if they are to allow the Proclamations in existence to continue, they should say that it shall be necessary for each person who, up to the present time, has shown himself a proper person to obtain a licence to go through the form and ceremony of obtaining another. It seems to me a most extraordinary thing that this proposal should come from a quarter of the House which generally protests so vehemently against encroachments upon the liberty of the subject in Ireland. We must remember that in the cases where persons in Ireland hold licences under the old Act the power of the Lord Lieutenant to revoke those licences will still continue; so that if a man who 12 months ago was entitled to carry arms has subsequently by his conduct deprived himself of that right, there will be no difficulty in revoking the licence. I trust the Committee will concur with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in the reasonable view he has expressed, and that he will retain the clause, which seems to be based on reason, as it stands.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down can have heard the reasons by which I ventured to support the Amendment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says it would be unreasonable that persons already having licences should be put to the trouble of coming up once more, and submitting to a new inquiry as to the propriety of licences being given to them. But I will give a reason for that course, and, I think, a very good reason. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may not think that a reason exists; but I can assure him that there is perfectly good ground and justification for the course I wish to see taken. We allege that, under the existing law, licences have been improperly given through the medium of the local Justices, who have had the power of issuing the certificates on which the Resident Magistrates have had no option left to them but to give the licences. We may be right, or we may be wrong, in taking that view. If we are right that licences were improperly issued, and we are sustained in that view, and the Government propose not to renew the clause, but to let it drop, declaring that it has been abused, there is ample justification for the line we are pursuing. If we are wrong there can be very little hardship in our proposal. Seeing that this Act is a renewal Act, there should be renewed inquiry into the desirability of granting licences in particular cases. The only objection the right hon. Gentleman has raised to our proposal is the Departmental objection that it would involve a great deal of trouble—that the Resident Magistrates would be put to the trouble of a fresh inquiry in each case, which would involve great difficulty and labour. That is so, no doubt; but the question is, is there a reasonable ground, or is there not, for the course that we have taken. Is not the power given to the local magistrates under the existing Act abused? If it is, I assert that there is no possible way of preventing its continuance except by the course I suggest—namely, by providing that the licences granted under the existing law shall not continue under this Act; but that, on the passing of this Act, a fresh inquiry shall take place.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): I believe the Amendment of the hon. Member is a proper one, and one that ought not to be rejected by this House. With regard to farmers and people of that class who require to have a gun or firearm of some sort, as a necessity, on their holdings, of course nothing can be said. The Amendment of my hon. Friend does not apply to them—it does not in any way relate to those whose positions make it necessary for them to have firearms. Of course, the farmers want to shoot rooks for the protection of their crops, and it is necessary that they should have firearms. But this clause does not aim at depriving farmers of firearms that are simply required for the shooting of birds. It is intended to prevent the arming of the people of Ireland. Under the old system the Licensing Authority had no option but to grant licences where two magistrates gave a certificate, and those licences might be for rifles such as were advertised for sale in Ireland a few weeks ago, or for revolvers. Whatever the licence might have been for, if two magistrates certified a person as fit, however unfit he might have been in reality, he would be looked upon as a proper person to be armed. I do not see what injustice can be inflicted in any body by having their licences revoked in the manner proposed. I myself hold a licence to carry firearms, and should be perfectly willing to put it in the fire and take my chance of either obtaining a renewal of it, or yielding up whatever firearms I may possess. I think every well-intentioned person would do the same thing. Under this Amendment licences will be revoked; but it will be possible for the persons losing them to obtain them again by giving such guarantees of their future behaviour as will satisfy the Licensing Authority that they will make no injudicious, rash, or foolhardy use of the firearms they may possess. No one can be inconvenienced by the course we propose. If the Amendment of my hon. Friend is accepted, when a Proclamation is issued every subject of Her Majesty in the specified district will have to give up all the firearms he possesses. The privilege of carrying arms is not, after all, such an enviable one. You cause no inconvenience to us when you say—"You shall not carry arms;" and we ought to be able to say the same of the people of the North of Ireland. Whether we wish to carry firearms or not, there is no Member of the House on this side below the Gangway, and there are none of my constituents who will find themselves in the smallest degree inconvenienced, or consider that an injustice is put on them, if it becomes a necessity to have a new licence given, and to have all existing licences cancelled.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I attach great importance to this Amendment, as I believe it bears on a large portion of the case. It will bear upon all the individuals who are to be the component parts of the three armies we heard about a while ago—the army of observation, the army of occupation, and the army of invasion. The Amendment has for its object the revocation of all licences already granted, and before they can be renewed the circumstances under which they are applied for and the objects of those who ask for them will have to be inquired into. The men whose licences would be inquired into would be those who have been recently taught lessons of a Constitutional character. They have been lectured at home; they have been lectured abroad; and they have had some admirable lessons delivered to them by the noble Lord who sits on the Front Bench above the Gangway, Lord Randolph Churchill. The right of insurrection and rebellion has been defined to them by the noble Lord; and this, together with speeches from other Members who sit above the Gangway, quotations from which we have listened to, will convey lessons to the people, who will all put their individual construction upon these lessons. The noble Lord, in a speech he delivered not long ago, quoted something in reference to Robespierre, who had a Constitution of his own based upon the right of insurrection. But what was the result of it? Every Frenchman at that time thought he had a right to construct it in his own fashion, and they had conspiracy after conspiracy, beside which the pronouncement of the three tailors of Tooley Street could not stand for a moment. The noble Lord has given to the Orangemen of the North of Ireland an interpretation as to their right to a Constitution based upon rebellion; but there are other interpretations, and the men who have the right to carry arms will interpret these Constitutional maxims by private interpretation. The Amendment is devised with the object of limiting the possession of arms so far as these dangerous men are concerned—who, according to the statement we heard a short time ago, have actually enlisted to the number of 10,000, 20,000, or 30,000 men. I think the House will do well to limit the issue of licences so far as these persons are concerned, who have enrolled themselves in the army of occupation. I met a young man, a friend of mine, in Cork the other day—agent for some very important properties—and we fell to discussing the present situation. I asked him what he and his friends were going to do, and he replied—"Why, take the field! But," said he, "I do not think we shall interfere with you, because you are a good sort of fellow." Thereupon I said—"I am very sorry for you, for the situation will be reversed. I have been going to take the field for 20 years, but have not succeeded yet. If you took the field we should go and stand on the ditch; and as I should not like to have the satisfaction of seeing our troops—our Imperial troops for which we are going to pay a certain sum each year—shoot you down, I am going to exercise my privilege as a Member of Parliament to prevent this occurrence. I shall exercise my rights and privileges in order to prevent your taking the field, because you are a very good fellow, and I do not want to see you shot down." If you accept this Amendment it will put the power in the hands of the magistrates. If in the North of Ireland you have proper magistrates it will give them power to inquire into these licences, and, above all, to revoke the licences of the men whom you would suppose to be the recruits of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. I urge the Committee to consider these as good and sound reasons for accepting the Amendment of my hon.

Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. M. Healy).

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): It is a rather remarkable fact that we have had very few statistics produced in relation to the working of the Arms Act. We have now got into Committee, and still none are produced. I certainly must say I appreciate the wisdom of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) in not producing them, because they would have proved very troublesome indeed. Accurate statistics in reference to the operation of the existing Arms Act would have shown conclusively that licences for revolvers and rifles have been issued wholesale in the North of Ireland, especially in Fermanagh and Derry, and the Government would have been in the position of coming to Parliament for a Bill enabling them to put down armed assemblies; and yet one of the principal clauses in that very Bill would promise not to interfere with any of the arms now possessed by the Orangemen of Ireland, against whom it is understood the renewal of the Act is chiefly directed. I cannot see that any great difficulty would arise from the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and for this reason—that the licences which have been issued in the North of Ireland are mainly licences for revolvers and rifles; and I should think that the Licensing Authorities, if they were Resident Magistrates, as I hope they will be, would deal with the application for such licences in a very summary manner indeed. I would not have the slightest objection to give to every Orangeman in the North of Ireland a fowling piece if he wanted it. A fowling piece is not wanted for purposes of war, inasmuch as it hardly carries 50 yards. But I have a great objection to allowing the Orangemen of the North to buy Sniders and revolvers, which cannot be of any use for legitimate or lawful purposes; and I think the Government are acting in a very curious manner in bringing in this Bill, which is said to be directed against armed assemblies, but which contains a clause which absolutely ties their hands. It has been pointed out to the Committee that the Lord Lieutenant has the power of revoking licences. I know he has, and the power has been exercised dozens of times in the case of individuals. I do not think its exercise in the case of a county or division would be dreamt of. There is another point to which the Committee has hardly given proper attention, and it is this—that the old Peace Preservation Act has not expired yet, and that the Orangemen of the North, having had a number of counties conveniently proclaimed for them, have had, for the last five or six months, in their hands the power, on the certificate of any two Orange magistrates, to insist upon having licences for revolvers, or rifles, or cannons for the matter of that. I venture to say that, even at the present moment, the Orange magistrates are very busily engaged in granting certificates to every anti-Nationalist in the proclaimed districts of the North, in order that these gentlemen may be provided with two-year licences. What sort of men are these by whom licences have been granted? There is a Return now in the House of Commons which was granted at the instance of my hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), from which it will be found that about 70 per cent of the magistrates are landlords and land agents, and that the rest are officials who have been more or less intimately connected with the misgovernment of Ireland for the last 80 years. In addition to that, they are, to a man, non-Catholic, and yet it is solemnly proposed to renew an Act practically containing a provision that the Orangemen are not to be touched; if the Act is to operate at all it is to operate against unarmed Catholics. I hope some Members on the Radical Benches will support us in our protest against this clause, a protest which it is most necessary to make even upon the showing of the Government. We must press the Amendment to a division, and if we are beaten in the division we shall have much pleasure in proposing the omission of the sub-section.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I have already spoken on the subject now under discussion; but since I spoke speeches have been made from different quarters of the House, to which I have listened most attentively. Having done so, I cannot help feeling how utterly ridiculous it is that the idea should be entertained, as it apparently is, that this Arms Bill is vitally necessary for the purpose of preventing civil war in Ulster. If the Government have got that idea in their heads in bringing in this Arms Bill, they might just as well drop it and go on with something sensible. The idea of civil war breaking out in Ulster is perfectly absurd. I represent a constituency in which fully one-half of the population are Orangemen. For 300 years back Orangemen have had the ascendancy in this part of Ireland; but I can say conscientiously, judging from my experience during the late Election, that there is no likelihood whatever of any open hostility by Orangemen to the march of the National cause.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that this is an Amendment to omit the words "and licence."

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I am going to come to that, Mr. Courtney. I am going to show that the Bill is altogether unnecessary, and that if we are to have it at all the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Healy) is a very desirable one. The Amendment is intended to secure that the present licences shall be reconsidered; because it is quite true that a great many licences that have been granted and are now in existence could be advantageously reconsidered. But, after all, the question which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the Committee should take into consideration is this—if the Bill is brought in for the purpose of stopping the arming of certain people in Ulster, it must do something more than it does at present. It is notorious that the Orangemen have arms, and that the great bulk of them have arms without any licence whatever. If you want this Bill for the purpose of disarming the Orangemen you must make some provision for the searching of the men's residences, in the same way as the Government did not scruple to allow the residences of Nationalists to be searched in the past. I think the Amendment is a very desirable one; but I do not think that it can possibly be too clearly or distinctly impressed upon the Committee that there is not the slightest chance of anything in the shape of civil war in Ireland.

MR. BARRY, Wexford, S.: I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that the proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Healy) is of a far-reaching character, amounting, as it practically does, to a revocation of all existing licences upon the expiration of the present Act. I am further of opinion that, unless the very strongest reasons can be brought forward in support of the Amendment, it should not be entertained. I maintain that we have submitted a most overwhelming case in favour of the Amendment. It has been shown that, under the existing Act, licences have been granted in the North of Ireland to any Orangeman who applied, and that the arms have been improperly used. We have it on the testimony of a former Chief Secretary that, after an ordinary public meeting, sacks full of revolvers were collected. We have instances in the North of Ireland of extensive firing, and we know that in some cases the effects were very serious. But there is a stronger reason than any of these why the Government should accept this Amendment, and that is that they have practically admitted that the Act was badly administered. If the Act was administered impartially, and if no licences were issued to doubtful characters, there is no reason, no justification for the proposal of the Government to drop Sub-section 4. In supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M. Healy) I wish to say that, so far as the Provinces of Leinster, Munster, and Connaught are concerned, there would have been no proposal to renew the Arms Act at all. The proposal is made on account of the peculiar conditions existing to-day in Ulster. But does not the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Morley) know that, unless this Amendment of my hon. Friend, or some Amendment very similar in character, is adopted, the Bill will be practically a dead letter? It is all very well to say that the Lord Lieutenant possesses the power to revoke licences; but the Lord Lieutenant only exercises that power on the representation of the magistrates. Is it at all likely that the Orange magistrates who granted the licences, and granted them for a special purpose, will make any representation to the Lord Lieutenant? I do not regard it at all as any safeguard to the Catholic population of the North of Ireland to say that the Lord Lieutenant possesses the power to revoke licences; and I hope that, after a full consideration of the case, the right hon. Gentleman will concede this Amendment. The only reason offered against it has been this that it would involve the officials in a great deal of trouble, and involve a considerable waste of time. Are the people who deserve to have licences not to have them, and those who do not deserve them to have them, because the officials will be involved in a great deal of work? Surely that is no reason at all why a grave public danger—and it is a grave public danger—should be allowed. I hope that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary insists in maintaining his opposition we shall have some stronger and more reasonable argument than that he has advanced as to the work which would be entailed on the officials by the carrying of the Amendment.

MR. E. RIDER COOK (West Ham, N.): I do not rise, Mr. Courtney, to take part in the discussion upon the Amendment before the Committee, but to call attention to the abominable atmosphere in which we are sitting. It seems to me that the air of this House is not only disagreeable, but that we are really sitting here at the risk of our lives. Unless something can be done, and that immediately, to remedy the evil, we ought, out of respect for ourselves and respect for our wives and children, to report Progress, and adjourn the House until such time as we can have an atmosphere in which it is proper for us to sit. I beg to move that you report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. E. Rider Cook.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I myself have not experienced any ill effects from the state of the atmosphere. I hope the Committee will continue its labours in spite of what strikes me as a somewhat imaginary grievance.

MR. COOTE (Huntingdon, S.): We are not all privileged to sit upon the Front Ministerial Bench. Though it may be true that right hon. Gentlemen do not find any occasion to complain of the state of the atmosphere, we who sit below the Gangway do experience very serious inconvenience. I hope something will be done speedily to improve the atmosphere of the House.

Mr. Barry

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, S.): As I was a Member of the Committee appointed last year to inquire into the nature of these smells, I must say that the smells have become very much worse this year than they were last. But I do not see the advantage of reporting Progress, or of adjourning the House for a single night. I do not think there is much chance of an improvement being made till a sum not less than £10,000 has been spent on the drainage system and other points connected with the sanitation of the House. What is required is a thorough overhauling of the whole system of sewerage; and, therefore, the mere reporting Progress for a single night will be of no use at all; if we adjourned till the work of improvement was completed we should have to adjourn for some months.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I listened with attention to the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken because he is an authority on these matters. I have personally made very great inquiry into the matter. I have consulted the people who clean out the House, and they tell me that in the morning the smell is abominable. Something ought to be done at once. The Gentlemen who sit on the Front Ministerial Bench ought to take the subject into consideration and see that immediate steps are taken. It is not right that we should have to come down here night after night and sit in an atmosphere like this. The atmosphere of the House is worse now than it has ever been since I first entered Parliament. It is absolutely necessary something should be done, and done at once. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Sir Lyon Playfair) said the work of improvement will cost £10,000. It may cost £10,000 or £20,000. Surely the Commons of England ought to have a proper place in which to meet. It matters not whether the work costs £10,000 or £20,000—it must be done. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Ham (Mr. Rider Cook) has done good service in calling attention to this matter, and I trust it will receive that consideration which its importance deserves.

DR. FOSTER (Chester): I rise to confirm the remarks made by the Mover of the Motion to report Progress, and also to say I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Sir Lyon Playfair) that to report Progress for a single night would have no effect upon the exceedingly deleterious atmosphere we are condemned to breathe. I entered the Aye Lobby a short time ago, and discovered a smell which was positively dangerous to health. I found the smell in the Central Lobby, and I was obliged, in order to get rid of it, to take refuge in the Smoke Room. I hope the Government will give their serious attention to this matter, whether it costs £10,000 or £20,000. As the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) has said, it is their urgent duty to take steps to get rid of this dangerous atmosphere in the House. It is impossible for men to be healthy when they are condemned to breathe these noxious vapours. Many Members have headaches continually in consequence of the prevalence of this unpleasant atmosphere; and, therefore, it is not to be expected that they can come with clear ideas to the discharge of their functions. I hope the Government will give their earnest attention to the question, and that if the Motion to report Progress is not pressed to a division it will, nevertheless, bear fruit.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): Perhaps, as Chairman of the Select Committee to which this question has been referred, I may be permitted to make one or two remarks. We have thoroughly investigated the whole drainage system of the House and precincts. We find there is a great deal to be done in order to place the whole of the drainage of the House in a proper sanitary condition. The work, however, cannot be done at once. Perhaps it is within the knowledge of the Committee that we have already taken steps effectually to ventilate the large sewer which runs from one end of the building to the other; and so far, I think, we have succeeded in removing one very considerable source of danger and discomfort. There are a great many other points which require attending to, and I can only say the Select Committee are fully aware of the very great importance of this matter. Only this very day we have completed our Report, which we hope to lay on the Table of the House on Monday at the latest. With regard to the smells complained of—and I believe fairly complained of, though unfortunately I have been away and unable to smell them—I have to say we are endeavouring to do what we possibly can, and I trust that the measures we propose will effectually stop the nuisance. What has been the extent of it to-day I have not had the advantage of judging. I propose to go round now, but in the absence of the hon. Member for Walworth (Mr. Isaacs) I do not propose to go down the sewer this evening. I do not think, however, that the smell is sufficiently strong to prevent the Business of the House being proceeded with.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): As we are now considering the important subject of the sanitary condition of the House, I take the opportunity of drawing attention to one matter which never seems to have been noticed. There are about the House a great many sewers; but I think the hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Sir Henry Roscoe) will find that one of the sources of offence and injury to health is something which is above the sewers—namely, the matting on the floor of the House. When there is a large number of Gentlemen tramping in and out, and you happen to get a glimpse of the floor in the right light, you find that there is—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must confine his observations to the Motion to report Progress.

MR. MOLLOY: I am giving one reason for reporting Progress. I was about to say that in certain lights a cloud of dust may be seen rising from the matting. If anyone will take the trouble to examine the arrangements of the House, they will find that underneath the matting there is absolutely a trap for catching all the dirt and soil which attaches to our shoes after leaving the streets. If the hon. Gentleman (Sir Henry Roscoe) will also turn his attention to the condition of the matting in the House, I am sure he will do well.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Edinburgh, Central): I think that after what has been said the wisest thing to do is to make the discussion upon the Bill as brief as possible. I would appeal to hon. Gentlemen to be brief in their remarks, and to let us adjourn without much further delay.

MR. E. RIDER COOK (West Ham, N.): I do not, of course, wish to embarrass the arrangements of the Government in any way. I am ignorant of their arrangements; but I felt it only right to call the attention of the Committee to the atmosphere in which we are sitting. Having done so, I shall, with the permission of the Committee, withdraw my Motion, and leave the responsibility of dealing with the matter in the hands of the Government.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the words 'and licence' stand part of the Clause."

MR. H. J. GILL (Limerick): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has said that the principal object of this Bill is to prevent large bodies of men bringing weapons to meetings and elections, and the like. We who sit upon these Benches would be very glad to know from the right hon. Gentleman what provisions there are in the present Bill to prevent these weapons being brought to meetings, and markets, and fairs? This is only a continuance of the existing Act; and, as far as we have been able to gather, weapons have been brought to these places, and we believe that the reason of the weapons being so brought is that numbers of persons who have no right to have licences have them. In what way in the new Bill, which is a continuance of the present Act, will that very dangerous state of things be remedied. I am sure that if the right hon. Gentleman would explain that to us briefly—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Amendment before the Committee, which is that the words "and licence" be omitted from the clause.

MR. H. J. GILL: I beg your pardon, Mr. Courtney. I was about to show that the Amendment should be passed, because its principal object is to prevent people from having the arms to bring to public gatherings. As others have said, we are not in the slightest degree afraid of civil war. We are only desirous of preserving the peace of the country; and I think if the right hon. Gentleman would explain to us in what way the present Bill will prevent the carrying of arms to meetings and other places my hon. Friend will scarcely press his Amendment to a division. I think that would satisfy, to a very great extent, the fears we have. We believe that weapons have been given to a great number of persons who have no right whatever to have them; we believe the weapons are still in their hands, and that the same danger will accrue in the future as in the past by their being carried. We would like to know what means there are in this Bill to make any change in this matter, and why, if weapons were carried in the past, they cannot be carried in the future?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I would point out to the hon. Member that much would depend on the spirit in which the Act is administered. The question must, therefore, be left to those who have to administer it. I have no doubt that that spirit will be a fair one, although I cannot, of course, expect the hon. Member to take my word or assurance on that point.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I think that we might arrive at a compromise on this subject by excluding fowling pieces, because these are used by farmers for necessary purposes on their farms. I do not know whether it would meet the view of the right hon. Gentleman if we were to allow the words "and licence" to stand, allowing people who have licences for fowling pieces to retain them, and refusing licences to those only who carry six-chamber revolvers. As the Act stands at present, any two magistrates will have the power to compel a licence to be granted to farmers for arms. They can have a licence to carry arms, and we find that the term "arms" includes cannons, guns, pistols, and so forth. I am sure that the power under the section will be exercised in an unfair and Party spirit by some of the people concerned. If the right hon. Gentleman will adopt this suggestion, I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will withdraw the present Amendment.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: With reference to the suggestion of the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) that cannon and so forth might be had or carried under the licence, of course, if we knew of any person in the North of Ireland or elsewhere having a battery of artillery the Lord Lieutenant would revoke his licence the very next day. The Amendment of the hon. Member would cause no small amount of trouble, and give rise to a great deal of bad feeling, because these licences have already been granted, and it is a much more serious thing to revoke a licence than it is to refuse to issue one, because the revocation affixes a stigma on the character of the person holding it. I must, therefore, decline to accept either the Amendment, or the compromise which hon. Gentlemen have proposed.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): With regard to my Amendment and the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, I say that his argument that it is a stronger thing to revoke than to grant a licence shows the value of the right hon. Gentleman's previous reference to the Lord Lieutenant's general power of revocation as a sufficient prevention of abuse. We want to see the right hon. Gentleman make some concession in the direction of the Amendment by limiting the facilities for carrying revolvers. At any rate, we say that there should be some revision of existing licences. If the right hon. Gentleman can see his way to give an undertaking of this kind I shall be happy to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: The Government have felt the necessity of taking power generally to revoke licences by Proclamation. We have felt also the necessity of considering to what extent the possession of arms prevails in different districts in Ireland; and if we find that there is a dangerous excess of persons in the possession of arms, a general revocation will issue of all licences in the district where the excess exists.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am clearly of opinion that there is no power of general revocation; and it is for that reason, and to meet the difficulty which is in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, that I propose a compromise which would confine the Amendment of my hon. Friend to warlike weapons.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): In asking leave to withdraw this Amendment, I beg to say that I shall move an Amendment giving the Government the power which the right hon. Gentleman has indicated.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word "licence," to insert the words "for fowling pieces and ammunition."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I have already given my reasons against the acceptance of this Amendment, and I cannot re-open the question.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend on Report, if necessary, to take power for the general revocation of licences in any part of Ireland?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I am advised that we have the power to revoke licences generally by the 2nd section of the Act as it now stands.

Amendment negatived.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I have to move that Sub-section 4 of Section 4 of the Act be not continued, and I shall not use more than two or three words in supporting the Amendment I propose. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have stated fairly enough their objection to this section, and I may remark, from an administrative point of view, there are objections equally strong; it is, therefore, in order to strengthen the Act that I propose this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 14, after the words "one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight," to add the words "save that Sub-section (4) of Section 4 of the said Act shall not be continued." — (Mr. John Morley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I propose to insert, after "Section four" in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the words "and Section five." The Court that tries cases of offence against the Act is composed of one Resident Magistrate and as many ex officio members as can possibly be obtained. Now, the result has been that the unpaid magistrates have often acquitted men whom the Resident Magistrate considered ought to have been convicted. We have had a number of examples of that brought forward in this House; and, Sir, we propose by a new clause to confine the power of trying these cases to a Court composed of two Resident Magistrates, thereby depriving these Orange partizans throughout the North of Ireland of the power to acquit guilty and convict innocent men which they have hitherto very largely exercised.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment to insert, after the words "of Section four," the words "and Section five."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I would point out to the hon. Member that the effect of striking out Section 5 of the Act would be also to remove the penalties provided by the Act.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): We have already had an Amendment upon the Table of the House to take the place of Section 5 of the Act, by which the penalty is reduced to a month's imprisonment, or a fine of £20, and it is provided that the Court is to consist of one Resident Magistrate at least.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: The Act says that the Court shall consist of two or more Justices of the Peace sitting in Petty Sessions, of whom one shall be a Resident Magistrate, or of one Resident Magistrate sitting alone in Petty Sessions. I cannot assent to the withdrawal of the 5th section of the Act—first, on the general ground that it would be re-opening the Act; and, secondly, because I do not believe that during the time the Act has been in operation there have been any complaints made as to the magnitude of the penalties provided for.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I am not in a position to say, of my own knowledge, that there have been frequent cases of abuse under this clause; but I know that, in one case, a man having some trifling weapons in his possession was committed, and it was notorious at the time that he was put in prison for three months simply because the Inspector wanted to take revenge for an agrarian outrage. That was under the Arms Act; it occurred before the Crimes Act was passed; and what I desire is that some safeguard may be established against the recurrence of similar practices. The right hon. Gentleman says that there have been no complaints. It seems to me that when there is no real intention to carry on war against the Government a month's imprisonment would be quite sufficient; and I am bound to say that one of our objections to the clause, and one reason why we move to leave it out, rests on the penalty contained therein, which we desire to shorten. And I think, also, it is very important, in connection with the working of the Act in Ulster, that the Court which tries these offences should consist of two Resident Magistrates without any local magistrates associated with them. I do not wish, in the slightest degree, to exhibit any vindictive spirit against the Orangemen in the North of Ireland, although they will not agree to bury the hatchet, and forget what has happened in the past. There is no case on record in which an Ulster Orangeman, charged with having arms in his possession illegally, has been punished. Orangemen so charged are usually brought up before the Court, warned, and dismissed; but every Nationalist brought up for that offence in the South of Ireland has been convicted. The Orangemen in the North can obtain licences to carry arms if they have friends on the Bench; but the case is different in the South of Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman feels confident, and can show that under the Act as it stands an Ulster Orangeman caught with arms will not be dealt with in the same manner as heretofore, then I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend unnecessary.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I rise to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny, and in doing so wish to observe that, in my opinion, three months is too great a penalty for an offence under the Act, because, in addition, it carries with it that one month of the term shall be spent on the plank bed. I do not suppose hon. Members on the opposite side of the House have had any experience of plank beds; but some of those on these Benches have had that experience. The plank bed is supplied with a pillow of unpicked oakum, which, from personal experience, I can assure the Committee is very hard; my experience of it, however, was short in comparison with that of the hon. Member for West Cork (Mr. Gilhooly). M'Carthy, of Galway, was sentenced under this Act, and he was on the plank bed for three months for having in his possession the cock of a rusty pistol. Such was the interpretation put on the Act by the magistrates. The Resident Magistrates in the South of Ireland who deal with the Nationalists under this Act have inflicted the severest penalties upon them. I was myself refused a licence some time ago by the Resident Magistrates; and it is the Resident Magistrates, who punish us unduly in the South of Ireland, who will administer this Act. I say that we desire to take the power of punishment out of their hands to some extent; we want to reduce it to the minimum which shall not carry with it the addition of the plank bed; and for these reasons I trust the Committee will pass the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and thereby reduce the term of imprisonment from three months to one month, which would, to some extent, meet the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I think we ought to leave this power alone in the hands of the Resident Magistrates. I have not the smallest confidence in the local magistrates; and it cannot be denied that it is desirable that they should not discharge these functions in districts where the proportion of Protestants against Catholics is 14 to 1. One reason in favour of the Resident Magistrates having this power is that they receive salaries which in case of need we can always attack in this House; whereas I should be out of Order in doing so in the case of local magistrates, because their salaries are not voted by this House. Therefore, I think the Resident Magistrates should alone have power of conviction under the Act. With regard to the term of three months' imprisonment, I think it is too long; and, no doubt, anyone who has spent that time in prison will agree with me. I appeal to the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), who, having refused to give bail for good behaviour, was sentenced to some months' imprisonment. I think the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that one month's imprisonment is quite long enough. As for imprisoning a man for three months for the possession of arms, compelling him to lie on a plank bed, starving him, and locking him up in his cell for 22 hours out of the 24. I say it is, perhaps, the most severe punishment that could be devised for the offence. For my own part, I think that 24 hours of such treatment would be sufficient; and I do trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will allow the penalty to be reduced from three months to one month, and to assent to our proposal that it should not be inflicted by local magistrates, because, as has been pointed out, wherever they want to secure a conviction of a Nationalist they flock into the Court and outvote the Resident Magistrate.

MR. PYNE (Waterford, W.): I rise to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend; and I think I can show a case of the coercion which is brought to bear upon Resident Magistrates by the local magistracy. I know a case of a man who was fond of snipe shooting, and who desired to get a licence, for which he could afford to pay. Well, Sir, the Resident Magistrate of that particular district wrote him a letter saying—

"If you should apply on the licensing day you will be refused. Apply a fortnight after that day and you will get a licence."

That, I think, is a distinct case of the coercion of a Resident Magistrate; and I say if you are going to take away a man's character and declare that he is not fit to carry arms, you should try him before a Superior Court by 12 of his countrymen.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 165: Majority 44.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

Amendment Mr. John Morley agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to move the following Proviso to Clause 2:—

"Provided, That from and after the passing of this Act the Court of Summary Jurisdiction mentioned in the fifth section of the said Act shall elsewhere than in the police district of Dublin Metropolis be constituted of two or more Resident Magistrates sitting alone in Petty Sessions."

I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Committee on this Amendment; but the Committee will recollect that the Court, as constituted by the existing Act, has on some occasions grossly abused its powers. The Court, as constituted under the Act, must consist of, at least, one Resident Magistrate, it is true; but our point is that one Resident Magistrate is practically useless, because, as a rule, a whip is sent round to the local magistrates whenever any of their friends get into trouble, and they put in an appearance and outvote the Resident Magistrate. That is our grievance; and the Amendment, therefore, provides that the Court shall consist of two Resident Magistrates—and two Resident Magistrates alone—in order to deprive the local magistrates of the power of acting in the manner I have described. It may be said that it is an unprecedented thing to take away the power of local magistrates, and to place jurisdiction of this kind in the hands of Resident Magistrates alone; but I would point out that the principle is in force already in the Crimes Act, which has been in operation for the last three years. Powers of a larger and more stringent kind than those involved in this Bill were put into the hands of Resident Magistrates solely by the Crimes Act; and, if my recollection serves me, the reason given for adopting that course was this. That having regard to the class of offences constituted under the Crimes Act—namely, offences of an agrarian character—local magistrates, who for the most part are largely interested in the agrarian question, could not deal with such cases with unprejudiced minds. Well, that is exactly our case in regard to this matter, which I am now putting before the Committee. We charge against them—and we can quote many instances in support of the charge—that these local magistrates put in an appearance and take their seats upon the Bench solely for the purpose of outvoting the Resident Magistrates and getting their political friends out of trouble; and we say that the same state of things will exist under this Bill unless Her Majesty's Government see their way to accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, after Sub-section 2. to insert the following sub-section:—"Provided, That from and after the passing of this Act the Court of Summary Jurisdiction mentioned in the fifth section of the said Act shall (elsewhere than in the police district of Dublin Metropolis) be constituted of two or more Resident Magistrates sitting alone in Petty Sessions."—(Mr. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the sub-section be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): After considering very carefully the point raised in the Amendment, and in view of the arguments brought forward from more than one portion of the House, I think it is possible for me to accept the Amendment. There are, however, some hon. Members who complain most bitterly of the decisions in places where Resident Magistrates preside; and, therefore, I am not at all sure that the substitution of Resident Magistrates for Justices will do away with all the hardships complained of. I think also that the statements of the opposition of the local magistrates must be a little exaggerated; but, on the whole, I am not prepared to contend for the present constitution of the Courts, and therefore I shall acquiesce in the Amendment.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I think, Sir, that the statement which we have just listened to from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was a very fair one; and my only object, therefore, in rising is to call his attention to another and a very strong argument in favour of this Amendment. I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Resident Magistrates will be salaried officials whose conduct we can review in this House.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): After the discussion which we have had upon the subject, I shall not move the first of the new clauses which stand in my name on the Paper; but I will move the second, which is that—

"There shall be published monthly in The Dublin Gazette a Return of the counties proclaimed with the number of licences refused, the number granted, and the character of the weapons licensed, distinguishing each county separately. The Return for the first month after the passing of this Act shall show the number of existing licences in each county, and the character of the weapons licensed."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): This Amendment asks us to do two things. It puts upon us the obligation of publishing in The Dublin Gazette a monthly Return of the new licences granted, and the number of refusals in each county. Well, that seems a fair thing, and I think it would be a reasonable thing also to put in a list of revocations. I do not see that there can be much objection to printing such a list; but I do not think it necessary that a clause to that effect would be inserted in the Bill. The second thing he asks us to do is to publish a Return of all the licences hitherto issued, and in existence at the present time. Now, such a Return as that must necessarily be inaccurate, because it is impossible to say how many of those to whom licences have been granted during the last five years are still alive, or to know whether they have not left the country. As far as I can see, therefore, all we can do is to give the number of licences which have been issued hitherto.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I think it would be better if we inserted the clause in the Bill, because then we should have the thing secured. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that his Predecessor in Office, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), gave a distinct pledge in this House, than which nothing could be more sacred, that a monthly Return should be published of evictions with the Return of outrages; but it was not until the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. M'Laren) drew attention to the matter that the pledge was continuously kept. In addition to what I have moved, I should like, if I can do so, on the Report stage, to move additional words to provide that there shall also be a Return of convictions.

MR. HOLMES (Dublin University): If the Returns are to be granted, I certainly think it desirable that the clause should be inserted in the Bill. Of course, I cannot understand the difficulties as well as the right hon. Gentleman; but it does seem to me that there will be a very considerable amount of difficulty in publishing the names of persons to whom licences have already been granted. I think it is reasonable that those which have been revoked should be given, and I think there should be no objection to giving the number of convictions; but I think the hon. and learned Member should confine himself to that, and take away that part of his Amendment which, in its administration, would lead to very considerable difficulties. Beyond that, it is desirable that Returns of this sort should be as accurate and complete as possible, and it is better that this clause should be confined to those Returns which can be made complete.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: As far as I am concerned, it is quite immaterial to me whether the clause is inserted in the Bill or not. I quite agree, however, with what has been said by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Holmes) that, in view of the impossibility of making the Return mentioned in the second paragraph of the Amendment anything like accurate, it might very well be dropped. There will be no difficulty in the Government assenting to the additional Return which the hon. and learned Member has mentioned on Report.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.) was understood to ask that the clause should be left in its present form until the Report stage.

MR. PYNE (Waterford, W.): Surely the Government must keep their accounts very badly if they cannot say who have been granted these licences, and who have not. If they could not tell who are the people to whom licences have been granted during the last five years, what is the use of the Act at all?

Clause agreed to.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I rise to move the insertion of a new clause—

"The possession by any person of any arm, or any portion or portions of an arm as defined by the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall, if such arm or portion or portions of such arm be practically unfit for actual use, be punishable under that Act by no greater penalty than the forfeiture thereof."

It would seem an inhuman absurdity that a man should get three months' imprisonment with hard labour—one month on a plank bed and three months' starvation—for the possession of a portion of a gun-lock, and yet such punishments have been inflicted. One would hardly think it possible that in a civilized country such a law as that could exist; but so it is, and for that reason I now bring forward this Amendment. An old and rusty portion of a gun-lock, an old rusty gun barrel, or an old blunderbuss, would not be a very formidable weapon in an Ulster war; and I do not think, therefore, that a man should receive any greater punishment than forfeiture. I should be happy to accept any verbal Amendment to the clause; but I think the principle must commend itself to everyone with a grain of common sense—that the possession of arms unfit for use be punished by forfeiture only.

New Clause—

"The possession by any person of any arm or any portion or portions of an arm, as defined by the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act 1881, shall, if such arm, or portion or portions of such arm be practically unfit for actual use, be punishable under that Act by no greater penalty than the forfeiture thereof,"—(Mr. Chance.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I am afraid I cannot accept this clause, which is brought forward without Notice, and altogether unexpectedly. It is highly inconvenient to re-open questions of principle which were decided when the original Bill was under discussion. This is merely a Continuance Bill, and it would be inexpedient to discuss upon it new questions of principle.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I am very much impressed with the case presented by the hon. Member opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary tells us that the magistrates who have charge of these matters will not be guilty of these absurdities in the future. But even Resident Magistrates are only men, and experience show that they are not infallible. If the hon. Gentleman's case is proved, that exaggerated and cruel sentences have been inflicted by those who are not Resident Magistrates, surely the case made earlier in the evening against leaving the administration of the Act in the hands of these gentlemen has also been proved. It is, no doubt, true that the Resident Magistrates will be more under the control of the Lord Lieutenant than the ordinary magistrates, because, being paid servants, they will be in a position to be turned off if they do not conduct themselves properly; but the cases which have been referred to show that it is necessary for us, by every means in our power, to restrict the power which these gentlemen possess of inflicting exaggerated penalties. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that it is awkward and inconvenient at this stage to re-open questions of principle which were decided under the original Act cannot be said to prevail against the question of equity. If it is wrong to exact exaggerated penalties for excessively light crimes or offences, I do not think the Committee, in considering the point, should allow itself to be influenced by the consideration of the inconvenience of going into the matter at this stage.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I rise to support the Amendment, because I think it unreasonable to leave it in the power of a magistrate to send a man to prison for three months for having in his possession a small part of a rusty gun or other firearm. The right hon. Gentleman says it would be inconvenient to alter the Bill; but I contend it would be far more inconvenient for a person to have to suffer three months' imprisonment, when, as a matter of fact, he does not deserve imprisonment for a single day. The right hon. Gentleman, I hope, will agree with us that the Resident Magistrates are not to take the law into their own hands in regard to this measure. They will be able to see their way to dealing easily and leniently with their friends the Orangemen of Ulster, whilst the full weight of their power will be experienced by our friends. I think, therefore, the Committee should assist us to protect these poor unfortunate people, who may be apprehended by the police, taken before the Court, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment and a plank bed for having somewhere on their premises a broken gun barrel or a rusty lock. I think this is a very reasonable and useful Amendment to this measure, and I trust it will be acceptable to every Member of the Committee.

MR. BOYD-KINNEAR (Fife, E.): I wish to say one word in deprecation of the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that in renewing the Bill we are not to enter into any question as to the propriety of the clauses it contains. It is our bounden duty to consider whether these clauses are just and equitable. We have our experience of the working of the Act to guide us, and we should be prepared to alter its provisions if experience proves that they require alteration. It seems to me that the Amendment now proposed is a just and reasonable one; and with regard to the point which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that we are safe in relying upon the discretion of the Resident Magistrates, I beg to say that I have been in Ireland and have observed the conduct of some of the Resident Magistrates, and must confess that it is conduct which does not give me the slightest confidence as to their universal discretion. These may be, I fully admit, exceptions; but I think we are quite right in this Bill in taking precautions against exceptional Resident Magistrates, who may not be possessed of that discretion and good feeling which the Chief Secretary attributes to them generally.

MR. HOLMES (Dublin University): I think the observations of the hon. Gentleman who represents one of the divisions of Cork illustrates how some of those who administer justice in Ireland are regarded by some people in that country. His remarks were based on the assumption that, in the administration of this Act during the past five years, the most unreasonable penalties have been inflicted by the magistrates. Well, in the course of this debate there has been no evidence given of anything of the kind. I hear it stated by an hon. Member that, on one occasion, a person who had in his possession a portion of a gun was subjected to a severe penalty. In the first place, I would point out that we know nothing about the facts and circumstances of that case, and it is rather a hard thing to judge on an ex parte statement in this matter without knowing the evidence or circumstances connected with it. In the second place, I would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that this is the only case of any kind that has been referred to.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): It is not the only case I should rely on.

MR. HOLMES: It is the only case that has been referred to in the course of this debate. I had considerable experience in the administration of the Act which preceded this during three years, and in the whole of that time it was my duty to look into almost all the cases against persons for infringing the Act. I would say that, in most cases, no penalty at all was administered; but that, in certain instances, the circumstances were of such a character as to necessitate a penalty, and even such a penalty as three months' imprisonment. As to the Amendment before the Committee, I would remind the Committee that it has been decided already that for offences against the Act there can be a penalty of up to three months' imprisonment inflicted; and now the suggestion is made that if only a portion of a weapon is found in a person's custody it should be considered to be useless, and no penalty should be inflicted beyond its forfeiture. Well, under certain circumstances, the possession of a portion of a weapon might be as serious an offence as the possession of an entire weapon. We can easily understand that one person might take possession of a gun-barrel, and another person residing next door to him take possession of the stock. It would be an absurd thing. I must say, to hold that if a man has an entire gun in his possession he shall be liable to three months' imprisonment; but that if he has only a portion of it, his neighbour having the remaining portion, and being able to turn it into an entire weapon at any moment, he shall only be liable to the forfeiture of so much of the weapon as he possesses. I agree that if there is a rusty old stock or a portion of a barrel, which could never be made use of, in his house, it would be unreasonable to inflict a penalty; but the Act provides that, in certain circumstances, the Bench are not bound to impose any penalty at all. If, in this matter, we leave the administration of the Act at the discretion of the tribunal, as we do in other matters, we shall be safe, for if the magistrates inflicted a penalty, without just cause and reason, on a person for being in possession of an old and useless portion of a gun, they would be called to account by the Government, and the penalty would be remitted by the clemency of the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): The proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chance) has both reason and common sense very strongly to recommend it. The case he referred to has been treated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down in a manner similar to that in which questions of the same kind have been treated in this House on former occasions. The idea of asking about the facts and circumstances, and of saying—"We have not heard the circumstances and surroundings." The fact stands out in all its deformity that a man has been sentenced to three months' imprisonment for no greater an offence than having part of a firearm in his possession. I do not see what "facts and circumstances" can be required to emphasize the action of the magistrates—the action speaks for itself. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also referred to the action of the Resident Magistrates, and the probability of their not acting absurdly. But I would point out that the Amendment contemplates taking away from the magistrates the power of acting absurdly, or of inflicting a heavier penalty than the circumstances of the case might warrant. I think the mere forfeiture of a firearm, or a portion of a firearm, that could not possibly be of use, and could be no element of danger one way or the other, would be quite commensurate with the offence of possessing that firearm or portion of a firearm. I trust the Committee will see the wisdom of adopting this Amendment, which, as I say, is recommended by sound common sense.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Holmes) is quite correct in saying that the clause is absurd, for the reason that there is no fear of the magistrates being guilty of the line of action it seeks to prevent. What could be more absurd than the two cases cited by the late Mr. A. M. Sullivan on a former occasion. There is the celebrated case of the monkey in Dublin performing with a toy gun. The monkey was arrested—I do not know whether it got three months' imprisonment. The other case was that of the gentleman who, when performing in the play, had to draw his sword in delivering the well-known lines—"My name is Norval, on the Grampian Hills." &c. A guardian of the peace standing by remarked—"Your name may be Norval, on the Grampian Hills; but you have no right to carry arms," and at once marched him off to gaol. I can give another case—that of a predecessor of the right hon. and learned Gentleman Judge Johnson, at one time Solicitor General for Ireland. Whilst on a railway journey this gentleman's Court sword got mislaid; it was taken possession of by the police, and the Judge's brother officials in the Castle in Dublin thought it an excellent thing to throw as many difficulties as possible in the way of his getting it back. It was days, I believe even weeks, before he could recover his Court sword. I think, therefore, that no absurdity is too great to be committed under this Act. It must be remembered that under the Act the possession of any part of a firearm renders a man liable to three months' imprisonment. We know that men very often find portions of old firearms in old corners of the house, old locks and stocks, of the existence of which they have forgotten. I do not know that they ever find a "rusty stock," as the right hon. and learned Gentleman put it. [Mr. HOLMES: Rusty lock, I said.] I never knew of a rusty stock being found, but a rusty lock might be. As has been pointed out, it may be absurd to expect such cases as have been referred to happen; but when they do happen they cease to be an absurdity to the men who get three months' imprisonment. The matter is a very serious one. I have no doubt that no Resident Magistrates would inflict penalties of three months' imprisonment in cases of this kind because of the feeling existing at present; but we have bad Resident Magistrates as well as good ones, and, as has been pointed out, it is a dangerous principle to say that we are not to alter these Acts because it will involve a little trouble. The Act may not be good. I would say to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that the Prime Minister has been in the House since this discussion commenced, and that there has been every opportunity for him to obtain the right hon. Gentleman's sanction to an alteration or modification of the clause so as to meet our very reasonable representations. I would suggest that the hon. Member should in his clause describe the arms to which it applies as "incapable of being used," or adopt some phrase of that kind. If he does so I do not see what ground the Government will have for objecting to his proposal.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I do not want to make more than a passing allusion to what has fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Holmes). He put the hypothetical case of two men living as neighbours, and each having in his possession part of a gun, which could be put together and made into a perfect weapon with ease and rapidity. I would point out to him that a case of that kind would be fully covered by this section, for it says that, the penalties of the Act shall not apply to any person—

“ If such arm, or portion or portions of such arm, be practically unfit for actual use.”

The clause would only cover the case where some farmer has in his possession a wretched blunderbuss, 150 years old, or a rusty old lock of a gun or pistol which could not possibly be reckoned fit for use. To such cases the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman do not apply. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has some cause to complain that this clause has been rushed on him at the last moment. There is a difference in principle between his clause and mine, and I trust that, having now had time to examine my proposition, he will accept it, or agree to put in something on Report to meet the difficulty. I would remind him that in the case to which reference has been made, where a man was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for having an old gun-lock in his possession, the person convicting was a Resident Magistrate. I have been reminded of another case, where a man was convicted and got over one month's imprisonment for having in his possession only a single percussion cap. No doubt, it is in the power of the magistrates to refrain from inflicting punishment if they do not think it necessary; but that is no reason why they should have it in their power to inflict unjust punishments. I hope some other Member of the Government will consider this subject, and give us some more satisfactory answer than the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I desire to say a few words by way of appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, to induce him, if possible, to modify the Act in the direction proposed by my hon. Friend. If the right hon. Gentleman only knew the Resident Magistrates who have the administration of this Act in the South of Ireland, he would have hesitated before nailing his colours to the mast as he has done in regard to this clause. Time after time in this House, both in this Parliament and the last, the Irish Members have had to ask Questions of Ministers as to the administration of these Acts by Resident Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman has got off now with ease by reason of the kindly feeling he has prompted by his policy of conciliation. I wish he could imbue these Resident Magistrates with his spirit. If he could it would be all right; but the men of whom complaints have been so frequently made are still at their posts. Captain Plunkett is still in Cork, day after day boasting that he will put down these rebels and Nationalists—a man who has used every opportunity of dying his hands in the blood of the people. [“ Oh, oh!”] Yes, I know it. I have met him foot to foot, and have been present at the meetings he has suppressed at an hour's notice; I have heard him order his men to fix their bayonets. This man will be taken up and put in an administrative position because his special occupation is now gone. His detectives used to follow him in the City of Cork like the tail of a boy's kite as he marched up and down the streets with his friends, male and female. He has nothing to do except, in the language of the poet, “ Spy his shadow in the sun.” I will not use the other line with regard to him lest it might be considered personal; but I know from his tyrannical disposition that he will only be too delighted to give every Nationalist in Cork three months' imprisonment if he can, and that, having done it, he would go to his Club and boast—as the hon. Member for Mid Cork knows—of the deed. If the right hon. Gentleman knew into whose hands he was placing this Act, and the terrible powers it confers on the Resident Magistrates, he would meet us some portion of the way. And when we ask him to diminish the sentence it will be in the power of Resident Magistrates to inflict on the unfortunate individuals who may come before them, he will hesitate, I trust, before he nails his colours to the mast, and will say that he must yield to the pressure from this side of the House and accept the Amendment, admitting, in the goodness of his own heart, that one month's imprisonment is quite sufficient to meet the cases that will come before the magistrates. The operation of this Act will be altogether different in the South of Ireland to what it will be in the North, where very properly the Executive have sent Resident Magistrates of kindly disposition to counteract the fierce motives of the Great Unpaid. But in the South we have the very worst magistrates that it was possible under the last régime to pick up—the Clifford Lloyds, the Blakes, the Plunketts, and the rest of them. These are the people who will have the administration of the Act. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his decision, and to meet us some portion of the way by accepting the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University): All through this evening hon. Members below the Gangway have been attacking, first the unpaid magistrates, and secondly, the paid Resident Magistrates. So long as they confined their attacks to the class generally, and so long as their object was to take away from them duties which were no doubt very irksome for them to perform, as I did not wish to assist in wasting the time of the Committee, I, for one, said nothing. Well, the powers contained in the Bill have now been restricted to Resident Magistrates, as hon. Members below the Gangway desired; but, not content with that, they now make an attack on the Resident Magistrates, and not only do they do that, but single out a Resident Magistrate by name without the smallest foundation, with no notice whatever. They think it fair and just to make these attacks. Captain Plunkett has been referred to. I do not speak of him because he happens to bear my own name. He is no relation of mine; but I happen to know him, and this I can say of him, that there is not a more honourable—[“Oh, oh!” and laughter.] Yes; and I will refer hon. Members who are now attacking him to Earl Spencer, whom they now quote as one of their great authorities. I would ask them to take his judgment of Captain Plunkett. I do not wish to protract this discussion further; but I wish to say that hon. Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway have now got a tribunal of their own choosing. The Stipendiary Magistrates are to have the administration of this law. I must say that it appears to me that the objection they take to this particular clause of the Arms Act is an entirely frivolous one. [Mr. CONYBEARE: No, no!] “No, no!” says an hon. Member below the Gangway opposite—an hon. Gentleman who probably never set his foot in Ireland in his life. [Mr. CONYBEARE: I have seen a good deal of Ireland.] I suppose upon the map; but, however that may be, what I say is that the discussion we are now engaged in shows the inconvenience of trying, as the Chief Secretary has said, to rip up this Act and go to the bottom of its policy in an Amendment to a mere Continuance Bill, because the whole basis of this Act is confidence in the tribunal which is to administer it. If you distrust the magistrate in a small matter, how absurd it is to trust him in a much more important matter. Perhaps I have spoken strongly; but I thought that to make this kind of attack upon individuals who are not present was not fair. As a matter of common sense, is it not absurd to spend our time in discussing the desirability of taking away from the magistrates what, after all, must be a matter of discretion and judgment whatever tribunal you give the administration of this Act to? Should we not leave them to deal with the matter as they think fit?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I do not think the Government will thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down for the help he has given them. We have no disposition on this side of the House for a long debate. I am of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has met us in this matter in a fair and reasonable spirit—my hon. Friends will acknowledge that, I am sure. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University gets up to defend the Resident Magistrates in this House on the ground that we fixed this tribunal, he seems to forget that it was a choice of two evils, and one we adopted on the distinct ground that the magistrates in the North of Ireland, being Orangemen, would be called upon to adjudicate in cases where the law was infringed by Orangemen, and that, consequently, injustice would continue in the future as it existed in the past. We therefore selected Resident Magistrates, because they are paid salaries, and we can impugn their conduct and attack their salaries in the House. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) talks of the unpopularity of Earl Spencer in Ireland, let me remind him of this—the right hon. and learned Gentleman is a shining light of the Kildare Street Club. He is a leading member of that Institution, where all the rotten landlords most do congregate; but there is another member of the Kildare Street Club who is not quite so popular there as the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not tell the Committee of the unpopularity of Lord Ashbourne at the Kildare Street Club, when the landlords believed that he had sold the pass in the Tory Administration.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is travelling somewhat from the question before the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course, Sir, I accept your ruling. I think, however, that my illustration would have had significance if I had been allowed to complete it; but it is evidently not congenial to hon. Members sitting above the Gangway. I think, however, as I have said before, that we have carried this debate far enough. It appears to me that it will be enough if the Government will give instructions to the Resident Magistrates to have regard to the character of the weapon found. When we agreed that the power of enforcing this Act should be vested in the Resident Magistrates, it was merely because we had only the choice of two evils; and the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken if he believes that we have any respect for Resident Magistrates. We regard them as nothing but a corrupt gang of salary-grabbers. We have the utmost contempt for them. They are generally broken-down landlords or promoted policemen, for whom we have no feelings of respect at all. But I say this, that it will be enough if the Government instruct them in the manner in which the Act should be administered, for they will be only too happy to obey them in the most servile manner. We all know that they are mere creatures of the Castle, and that if the Government pull the strings in the Castle these marionettes will be dancing in every county in Ireland.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: In reply to the hon. and learned Member, I wish to point out, as to the suggestion that the Government should give instructions to the Resident Magistrates how they are to administer this portion of the Act, that is obviously impossible. It is also impossible, however, to suppose that in the case contemplated by the hon. and learned Member the Resident Magistrate would be guilty of inflicting an extravagant sentence for an offence which is not an offence at all. In the next place, I would suggest this to hon.

Members. If a case does arise in which one of the Resident Magistrates inflicts a penalty of this kind, it is clear and certain that a Memorial would be sent up to the Lord Lieutenant at once, and 24 hours would not be allowed to elapse before His Excellency exercised his prerogative. Hon. Members will admit that I have done my best to meet all reasonable objections to this Bill; but I cannot go any further than I have gone in this matter.

Clause negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN: The principle of the Amendment which has been sent up in the name of the noble Lord the Member for North Tyrone (Lord Ernest Hamilton) has been anticipated by an Amendment already dealt with.

On Motion of MR. JOHN MORLEY, the following Amendment made:—Title, after “continue,” insert “and amend.”

Question put, “That the Chairman do report this Bill, as amended, to the House.”

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to reprint this Bill as amended?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. JOHN MORLEY): No, Sir; I wish to take the Report to-morrow, and therefore the Bill cannot, as I understand, be reprinted in time.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I presume it is in Order for me to move that the Bill be reprinted; but I think it will be better to do so when the Speaker is in the Chair.

Bill reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill, as amended, be considered To-morrow.”—Mr. John Morley.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I think that is too early a day on which to take the Report. We shall certainly want time to consider some of these Amendments, and to decide whether we will propose further Amendments. It is clear now that the Bill cannot be passed before the 1st of June; and, therefore, I think that the Report should be postponed until Monday, and the Bill reprinted. Another day or two cannot matter. I move that the Bill be considered on Monday next.

Amendment proposed, to leave out “To-morrow,” and insert “upon Monday next.”—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That 'To-morrow' stand part of the Question."

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I trust the hon. and learned Member will not insist upon his Motion. There have been some unfortunate delays with the Bill in consequence of the action of certain hon. Members; but even if it cannot pass before the 1st of June, that is no reason why this House should not finish with it as soon as possible. All the Amendments have been straightforward and unmistakable, and nothing has been introduced which calls for much further consideration. There is no reason, therefore, why the Report should be postponed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will you object to the Bill being reprinted?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: That will be difficult if it is to be taken to-morrow.

Question, put, and agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): Now, Sir, I beg to move that the Bill be reprinted. The whole Bill could be set up in a couple of stickfulls of type, and there is not a newspaper office in the country where the Bill could not be printed in five minutes, and certainly in the Queen's Printing Office it ought to be ready in 12 hours. We do not want the Bill the first thing to-morrow, but when the Report is called on.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I am now told by the proper authorities that it is possible, and, therefore, we will do it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to be printed. [Bill 240.]

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Adjourned Debate on Amendment on Second Reading [10th May] further adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I wish, Sir, on this Order to make a suggestion which will, I think, secure unanimous support from all quarters of the House. There is no Business of great importance on the Order Book to-night which could be proceeded with at this hour with advantage, and I take this opportunity of bringing before this House a subject which, I think, must exercise hon. Members more or less, and which I assure this House has exercised hon. Members on this Bench a great deal more than less. It is a subject, Sir, to which I believe you have directed your most anxious attention—namely, the atmosphere of this House—the poisonous and mephitic atmosphere we have to breathe night after night with the utmost disadvantage to our physical and mental capacities. Therefore, I rise to move the adjournment of the House—first of all, because the atmosphere of the House to-night is in a worse state than I have known it for some time; secondly, because I do think that if the House, on a convenient opportunity like the present, marked its sense of the utter barbarity and incivilization of the sanitary arrangements by adjourning rather before its usual hour, it is possible that the authorities of the House may rouse themselves from that inertia which now appears to possess them, and may call to their aid the resources of science in order that the Members of the House of Commons may breathe an approximately pure air. Under these circumstances, believing that the House may think it is desirable that the attention of the public generally should be called to the imperfect state of the ventilation of this House, I do hope hon. Members will not think I am making an exaggerated demand when I ask them to adjourn early to-night, and refuse to sit here in this vitiated atmosphere any longer. I do not know what the sensations of other hon. Members may be; but I know this, that there is an hon. Gentleman on this side of the House—he is an Ulster Member, though I do not know if he will get much sympathy on that account—an hon. Gentleman on this side of the House is at the present moment, I hear, dangerously ill with a fever of the typhoid kind, and it is seriously suspected that he contracted that fever in this House. Whether that is so or not, I can say, from my own experience, that once or twice during the last few days the air in the House has been terrible, and that which has come up through the floor has been such as to make one perfectly nauseated, and incapable of attending to Business. I venture to appeal, therefore, to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to support the views I have stated in this matter that some strenuous and determined step may be taken by the House in order that we may conduct our Business in a sanitary, if not always in an harmonious, atmosphere. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby)): I am very happy to find myself for once, at all events, in entire sympathy with the noble Lord. There is a well-known saying that "misery makes strange bed-fellows." I think the misery we have all undergone to-night has been such as may well induce us to retire to our beds at the earliest moment. I entirely share with the noble Lord the sentiments he has expressed as to the disgrace that the House of Commons should be called upon, in these days when we are talking so much about the sanitary arrangements of everybody else, to suffer from the insanitary conditions of which we complain to-night. I think it is important that we should mark our sense of what we have had to endure, and that we should do so by agreeing to the proposal of the noble Lord, and adjourning at this comparatively early hour.

Question put, and agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—THE TABLE OF THIS HOUSE.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he had never yet been able to discover who had the management of the internal affairs of their Lordships' House; but he desired to appeal to that authority, whoever it was, as to whether they might not have the magnificent article of furniture—the use and contents of which no one seemed to know anything about—on the Clerks' Table, in front of the Opposition Benches, removed, and in its place have a complete copy of the Statutes. At present, whenever they required a copy of any particular Statute, it was necessary that they should travel a quarter of a mile to obtain it. Without wishing to excite rivalry between the two Houses, he would ask that their Lordships should follow the example of the House of Commons in this matter, and have a complete copy of the Statutes on the Table.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (EARL GRANVILLE) said, he had always thought that the Opposition, in having such a magnificent work of Art before them to thump upon, enjoyed an unfair monopoly. The Government, however, would have no objection to order its removal, and place there a complete copy of the Statutes as desired.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 130.)

(The Lord FitzGerald.)

REPORT.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendments read.

Moved, "That the said Report be now received."—(The Lord FitzGerald.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he would suggest that, as there had been several new Amendments of importance placed upon the Paper, the present stage of the Bill should be postponed for a few days.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he was willing to postpone the Report of Amendment until Monday, and the new clauses of which he had given Notice to the third reading stage.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought it would be more convenient to re-commit the Bill.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that the new clauses introduced, for the first time, the Land Commission to fix the price of land taken compulsorily under the Labourers Acts. Considering the importance of the point, he submitted that the Bill ought to be re-committed.

Amendment moved, to leave out from the word ("that") to the end of the Motion and insert ("the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House.")—(The Earl of Limerick.)

On question, Whether to agree to the said amendment, resolved in the negative: Then the original motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn: Moved, that the Report of the amendments be received on Friday next: The said motion agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)

BILL.—(No. 122.)

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Earl SPENCER), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the subject was not by any means new to their Lordships, nor was there any new principle in the measure he had to propose. Its principle, which was to give powers to the Privy Council to make regulations with regard to cattle diseases, had been accepted, he might say, by the Leaders of both Parties in both Houses of Parliament, and the Bill would only enlarge and make more perfect the scope of the several measures on the subject which had been passed. The principal measure to which it referred was the Act of 1878; and he was happy to say that, on the whole, that measure had worked very satisfactorily. Doubtless, at different times, there had been objections to it, on the score that it would limit the importation of live animals into this country, and would thus affect the food supply of the large centres of the population. That, however, had not been the case. If the figures in regard to importation were looked at, it would be found that, although they fluctuated, importation had progressed in a natural and steady way since the Act had been in operation. In 1865, when the importation of cattle was not affected by the cattle plague, the number of cattle imported into this country was 283,271; it was 372,731 last year. The cattle plague, no doubt, affected the number of cattle imported to a considerable extent. The total number of live animals—cattle, sheep, and pigs—imported fell from 1,330,350 in 1865, to 508,802 in 1868. After that, the importation of cattle increased, until it rose from 252,201 in 1878 to 472,839 in 1883. The total importation of live animals in 1883 was 1,624,882; in 1884 it was 1,393,913, and in 1885 it was 1,141,534. Since 1883 there had been a diminution in the importation of cattle from 472,839 in that year to 372,731 in 1885; but there had besides been a large importation of dead meat, and he thought he might fairly say that the measure, which was intended to prevent the importation of disease into this country, had not had a bad effect on the amount of animal food introduced, a matter which was so important to the consumers in large towns. The Act of 1878 had been carried out in a very stringent way, and since then no cattle plague had been imported. If, unfortunately, that terrible disease were to be introduced, the regulations were so good that they might be confidently said that the disease would not spread beyond the limits of the wharf. With regard to pleuro-pneumonia, there had been since 1877 a very marked decline in that dangerous and very insidious disease, which had caused such great loss to our farmers at different periods. In 1877 there were 2,007 outbreaks of the disease, and 5,168 animals were attacked; whereas, in 1885, the number of outbreaks was only 404, and of animals attacked 1,511. That showed that the Act up to this time had worked tolerably satisfactorily; but there was no doubt that pleuro-pneumonia still existed to a dangerous extent in certain great towns such as Dublin, London, and other centres of population, and it was one of the objects of the present Bill to take further steps for checking the spread of the disease. The Act of 1878 required the Local Authorities to slaughter at once all animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia; but it was optional with them whether they would slaughter animals which had been in contact with the disease. Now, such was the insidious character of pleuro-pneumonia, and the period of incubation was so long, that they had found by experience that the disease might break out again in places where the diseased animals had been slaughtered and the premises declared free. The consequence was, that the remaining animals might be removed to any part of the country, probably carrying with them the seeds of a fresh outbreak. This Bill, therefore, proposed to give power to the Privy Council to order the Local Authority to slaughter and pay compensation for animals that had been in contact with the disease, and also, if they thought fit, to authorize the slaughter of a suspected animal with the view of ascertaining, in doubtful cases, whether the disease existed or not. He would give an example of how successful the principles of the Bill had been in other countries. Holland, a few years ago, was a hot-bed of pleuro-pneumonia, and the matter was taken up with great vigour by the Government of that country. In 1871, when the slaughter of diseased animals was first ordered, there were no less than 6,079 cases of disease; while, in 1877, the number had fallen to 951; and, in 1885, there were no living animals affected by the disease, and only 28 cases were discovered on post-mortem examination. Foot-and-mouth disease first broke out in 1880, and up to 1884 that disease was very rife in all parts of Great Britain, and to some extent in Ireland. In 1883, the number of animals attacked in Great Britain was 461,145; and the effect of the Act was that in 1884-5 there were only 418 cases; while, in January last, there was not a single authenticated case in the Kingdom. He thought that those figures showed a very satisfactory result of the operation of the Act, and ought to be some consolation to the farmers who had suffered so much depression during the past few years. It was the first time there had been no case of this disease for 50 years. Though there had been no authenticated cases of foot-and-mouth disease, there had been several cases of reported foot-and-mouth disease; but, on the Inspector being sent down, they were found to be really not cases of that disease. When there were very few cases of disease in the country, the Privy Council were able to send down Inspectors to infected districts. But when the disease was very rife, that could not be done, and it was necessary that the Privy Council should be able to compel the Local Authority to obtain skilled advice before declaring their district free. Power to do so was sought for in the Bill, as many cases were known in which the Local Authority had declared a district free too soon. It was also desired to legalize a power which it was at present rather doubtful whether the Privy Council had power to adopt, although it had certainly been adopted under the general powers of that Body. He referred to the power of declaring what were called infected circles; and in order to make sure of the powers in that respect, the Bill proposed to confer on the Privy Council the power of putting the system of infected circles into operation whenever it might be thought necessary. There was another matter of considerable importance, and that was that the Local Authorities in counties—the Quarter Sessions—had power to delegate some of their powers, and in some counties these Local Authorities had delegated nearly all their powers to Committees. There were powers, however, which it was thought ought to be kept in the hands of the Central County Authority, and therefore it was proposed in the Bill to give the Privy Council power to govern the delegation of powers from the County Authorities to Sub-Committees. Another important point was, that the Privy Council had now authority to vary the definition of diseases coming under the Act, but they had no power to vary the definition of animals coming under the Act. It was thought very important in view of the amount of rabies at present in the country that that power should be given, and therefore it was sought by the Bill to confer that power on the Privy Council, in order to bring within their jurisdiction cases of dogs infected with rabies. It was also sought by the Bill to transfer from the Privy Council to the Local Government Board certain powers as to the regulation of dairies. There was nothing more important than that matter, and the Government believed that the powers now existing with reference to it would be much better exercised by the Local Government Board. He had a Return before him, which showed that the Local Authorities had not put that part of the Act of 1878 very much into force, and it was thought that the officers of the Local Government Board would be better able to see that the provisions of the Act were carried into effect. He thought it was not necessary to detain their Lordships any longer, and he hoped and felt that there would be very little opposition to the measure. He thought it would make the Act of 1878 more effectual; and if this country could emulate the example set by a country like Holland, it would confer a great benefit on the farmers of the country, as well as on all the consumers of meat in the large towns. He would move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord President.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he quite concurred in regarding this as a purely non-contentious measure. It would, therefore, receive no opposition from him as regarded its future progress; on the contrary, he would gladly do all in his power to assist the noble Earl in passing this very useful Bill, which, he believed, would bring about a valuable and useful change in the law. It was gratifying to know that previous legislation on the subject to which the Bill referred had resulted so satisfactorily, and that the dark prophecies which were made as to the working of the Act of 1878, and as to the probable failure of our supply of food, had not been fulfilled. It was also equally satisfactory that eight years' experience of the provisions of that Act suggested so few amendments as would be found to be embodied in the present Bill. Since the measure of 1878 there had not been a single case of cattle plague in this country. The slaughter of animals that had been in contact with beasts suffering from pleuro-pneumonia could not but have a salutary effect. He looked upon those clauses of the Bill which dealt with the subjects of the pollution of milk and the inspection of dairies as highly important. He trusted that there would be no conflict of Authorities in connection with the enforcement of those provisions. In conclusion, he would suggest to the noble Earl that Clauses 8 and 10 were rather clumsily constructed. The intention of the pro-motors of the measure in those clauses might be expressed in a simpler manner.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, he considered the Bill a most valuable one, and would suggest that it should be left to the discretion of the Local Authorities to say for what period an area should be regarded as "an infected circle."

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH said, he did not think the Local Government Board could work the regulations with regard to dairies without a considerable increase in the number of Inspectors and of expense. He was of opinion that the Local Government Board should, as much as possible, exercise the powers which the Bill would confer upon it through the Local Executive Authorities. Such a course, he argued, would conduce to the readier acceptance of the regulations issued by the Board in respect of dairies. Without the cordial support of the Local Authorities it would be most difficult to carry out the provisions of the measure; and it was most desirable that they should be assisted as far as possible by the Central Authority in London; but any clashing of Government Departments was highly to be deprecated in these matters.

THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE contended that the carrying out of the provisions of the Bill by local Sub-Committees was essential to effectively checking the spread of contagious diseases. He thought those Sub-Committees were the backbone of the measure.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

INFANTS BILL.—(No 126.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSHELL) said, he was of opinion that it would be desirable to provide that applications by father or mother for custody or access should be made ex parte, so as to avoid the annoyance of repeated summonses. He would, therefore, on the third reading, move an Amendment giving power to frame rules; and, in the framing of those rules, he should endeavour to have this object attained.

THE PROPOSED COLONIAL INFORMATION DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can now state what arrangements have been made at the Colonial Office for a separate Department having charge of all matters connected with Colonization; and, whether he is now able to place on the Table, according to the intention he announced before Easter, the various documents which had been addressed to the Colonial Office on the subject of emigration, including that entitled "A system of State-directed Colonization," which was presented to him by the National Association for Promoting State-directed Colonization? The noble Earl had on previous occasions showed great sympathy with this subject—an interest commensurate with the feeling in the country—and it was to be hoped that he might now be in a position to state that this Colonization Department was about to be formed. This subject was one of pressing interest at the present time, on account of the great depression which prevailed.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Earl GRANVILLE), in reply, said, he had last week laid the Papers referred to by the noble Earl upon the Table, and they would be distributed before the next meeting of the House. In them would be found the necessary information with regard to the new Department they proposed to establish. With regard to it, he could assure the noble Earl that the Colonial Office was absolutely prepared. The only cause of delay was the difficulty of finding proper office accommodation, and he hoped that would not continue, for it was expected that that difficulty would shortly be surmounted.

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD—ANNUAL INSPECTION OF ASYLUMS.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH (Hants, Basingstoke) asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he is aware that the annual inspections by the Metropolitan Asylums Board of the four non-infectious establishments under their control are followed by entertainments on a lavish scale to the managers and their friends at the expense of the metropolitan rate-payers; whether it is the fact that, at a recent meeting of the Board, Sir Edmund Currie, the Vice Chairman, estimated the cost of each of these four annual entertainments at £100, and stated that the inspection, which was the pretext for their being given, was for all practical purposes worthless; and, whether, under these circumstances, the Local Government Board will for the future disallow the cost of these festivities?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): It has been the practice for the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District to have annual inspections of the Leavesden, Caterham, and Darenth Asylums, and the ship Enmouth. The Chairmen and other influential members of the Boards of Guardians in the Metropolis, and representatives of the Press are invited to attend on these occasions, and refreshments are provided.

The cost of the four annual inspections in 1885 amounted to £245. This is a considerable reduction upon the amount expended in some previous years, and the Board trust that the expenditure will be still further reduced. It is to be borne in mind that these annual inspections are the occasions when the Asylums are officially visited by the Managers who are not on the Committees for the management of those Asylums.

DOMINION OF CANADA—EXTRADI-TION ACT, 1877.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Imperial Government is aware that the American Continent forms the principal refuge for fugitives from British justice; if it is a fact that the Parliament of Canada long since passed a Law to check the influx of American fugitives into the Dominion, to take effect as soon as the relations between the two peoples of the Anglo-Saxon race could be placed on a footing more consonant with the friendship existing between them and with modern civilisation; and, if steps are being taken to conclude a new Treaty of Extradition to replace the one of 1842, extending to only six crimes, between Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and the United States of America; and, in such case, what prospect there is of its early completion?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The Government of Her Majesty the Queen are not in possession of any exact statistics as to the various refuges of fugitives from British justice. No law of the nature described in the second paragraph of the hon. Member's Question is known to have been passed by the Parliament of Canada, for I cannot suppose that his expression refers to the general Extradition Act passed by Canada in 1877, which follows very closely the Imperial Act of 1870, and which provides for carrying into effect existing or future Extradition Treaties between Her Majesty and Foreign Powers. Negotiations for the conclusion of more satisfactory arrangements in regard to extradition between Her Majesty's Dominions and the United States, are at this moment in progress, and it is hoped may shortly be completed.

Mr. Stansfeld

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BELFAST
BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the Belfast newspaper reports of the proceedings of the Belfast Board of Guardians at their meeting of the 16th March 1886, in which Mr. Mitchell, one of the members, made a report against John Y. Brown's conduct, as contractor for the hardware to the union for the year ending 25th March 1886; is it true that Brown supplied goods inferior to sample (previous to his arrangement in bankruptcy) and as a part of his contract; is it a fact that sometimes bogus invoices were delivered to the workhouse master, as well as invoices on which no prices were set forth; is it true, as the master stated, that Brown delivered goods frequently without orders from any person in authority, and that he (the master) received them into stock, and passed the accounts to the guardians for payment, and which payments Brown duly received until the irregularities were detected, and the frauds exposed by Mr. Mitchell, has the extent of the impositions been as yet ascertained; and, if so, have the contractor or his sureties been made accountable to the ratepayers; is it true that Mr. Hamilton, the Poor Law Inspector, delivered a panegyric on the management of the Belfast Workhouse in his last half-yearly report to the guardians, and made no reference to this apparent collusion between Brown and the master; and, will the Local Government Board institute any inquiry into his case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, this matter, I understand, has been under investigation by a Committee of the Guardians, and the result has been that the only substantial fault to be found is that certain goods supplied by Brown outside his contract, but on proper authority, were shown to have been overcharged for. The amount of the overcharge is £2. Mr. Brown explained that the reason was that the usual trade discount was not allowed. The account was not paid, and it was ordered that this amount be deducted from it. The Master denies having made any such statement as is attributed to him. It is quite true that the Inspector spoke favourably of the general management of the workhouse.

POST OFFICE—POST CARDS.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the halfpenny Post Cards cost more than a halfpenny each, while the penny Post Cards are sold at one penny each?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): In answer to the hon. Member's Question, I have to state that as regards Inland Post Cards, the extra amount charged is only sufficient to recoup the State for the cost of material, custody, and distribution. The price of the Foreign Cards is fixed at 1d. (10 centimes) by the Postal Union Convention.

LICENSING LAWS, 1883-4-5—RETURNS.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What are the difficulties which prevent his laying upon the Table of the House, the Returns asked for showing the number of convictions for breaches of the Licensing Laws during the years 1883, 1884, and 1885; the number of licences granted for houses, the registered owners of which are brewers, distillers, or holders of wholesale licences for the sale of wines, spirits, or beer, and other information of a similar character of which notice has been given him?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the reason why I should not feel justified in agreeing to this Return is that owing to the great variety of detailed information which would have to be collected from every part of the country, the result obtained would not, in my opinion, justify the necessary expenditure of time and money. The hon. Member is, I believe, aware that a part of the information he desires is to be found in the published volumes of judicial statistics.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL— CIVIL SERVANTS

retary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the sum total of the salaries and wages in the Civil Service proposed to be placed under the control of the Irish Executive by the Government of Ireland Bill; whether the following list correctly represents the offices and services which will be transferred from the Imperial to Irish control:—Board of Works, Chief Secretary's Office, Charitable Donations, Local Government Board, Grants in aid of Schoolmasters and Doctors, Public Works, Registrar General's Office, Record Office, Valuation and Boundary Survey, Law Charges, Supreme Court of Judicature, Court of Bankruptcy, Registry of Deeds, Registry of Judgments, Land Commissioners, County Court Offices, Reformatory Dundrum, Dublin Metropolitan Police, Constabulary, Constabulary Pensions, and Prisons; and, what is the total number of separate appointments for which provision is made in the Irish Civil Service Estimates?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne): It is extremely difficult to answer as satisfactorily as I should like the inquiry of the hon. Member. In the first place, the Bill does not specify what branches of the Civil Service are to be transferred to the Irish Executive. In the second place, the continuance of branches will depend on the view taken by the Irish Executive of its own requirements. Then, again, it is not easy to define a Civil servant. However, I am disposed to think that the information which the hon. Member wishes to obtain would, as regards the permanent service as it stands now, subject to any special reservations in the Bill and exclusive, of course, of Customs and Excise, be generally interesting, and I shall be prepared to give the Return if it is confined to cases in which 1. the whole salary is now voted by Parliament; 2. the official's whole time is at the disposal of the public; and 3. the appointment carries pension or gratuity on discharge. These are the three limitations which, I think, constitute the definition of a Civil servant within the sense of the Question. The appointments might conveniently be classed in such a Return under three heads—a Heads of Departments, superior appointments, and clerical staff; b messengers and servants; and c any others.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman refuse to give those local officers, subsidized by the Central Government, over which the Executive of Ireland would have power to withdraw the salary and dismiss the officer?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: No, Sir. In my proposed Return I would not include cases of that description.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Shall I move for the Return?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Yes; I think that would be the most convenient course.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are 3,000 of these local officers which will be under the authority of the Irish Executive?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I was not aware. I will make a little further inquiry, and see if it is possible to include them in the Return, though I am doubtful about it.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—GRAIN BAGS—RUSSIAN REGULATIONS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State was called in December last to the fact that the Russian Government had made regulations imposing a duty on jute bags used by British steamers in packing grain at Odessa and other Russian ports for English ports; whether every British vessel having bags on board for such purpose, as provided under our Merchant Shipping Laws, is compelled, before using them at Russian ports, to discharge them, to pay cartage on them to and from the Custom House, and to pay the Russian duty as on imported goods, involving delay and the payment of duty over and over again on the same bags; and, whether any correspondence has taken place with the Russian Government on the subject of this impost, and with what result?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BRYCE) (Aberdeen, S.): The attention of the Secretary of State was called in July last to the regulations complained of, which, however, are stated by the Russian Government not to be new. Their result is in the main correctly stated in the second paragraph of the Question. Representations have been made to the Russian Government on the subject, and it is still the subject of active correspondence between Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg and the Russian Government.

MR. SAUNDERS (Hull, E.): asked whether the hon. Gentleman could produce the correspondence to which he referred for the advantage of the merchants interested?

MR. BRYCE said, that the Correspondence was not yet completed, but when completed he thought it might be produced. It should be carefully looked up to see whether that could be done.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT—RATING OF LUNATIC ASYLUMS, &c.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in any scheme of Local Self Government which may be in contemplation for England by Her Majesty's Ministers, it is proposed that the rating of lunatic asylums, and also of land and buildings belonging to or occupied by the Crown, should be made upon an equally full valuation with private property in the same locality or rating district?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax): I am not prepared to make any statement as to the scheme of Local Government contemplated by Her Majesty's Government; but I may say that I do not think it would be expedient to attempt to deal with questions as to the rating of particular classes of property in a Bill having for its primary object the constitution of Local Authorities and the determination of the areas within which they shall have jurisdiction.

MR. KIMBER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had any intention of bringing in a rating Bill?

MR. STANSFELD said, he did not expect to bring in such a Bill this Session.

SEA FISHERIES (IRELAND)—TRAWLING ON THE COAST OF DONEGAL.

MR. BERNARD KELLY (Donegal, S.): asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on the 10th May, a memorial was forwarded by the fishermen of St. John's Point and Inver districts, county Donegal, to the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, praying for an inquiry into the trawling in Donegal, Inver, and Killybegs Bays; and, whether any steps have been taken with the view of rectifying the grievances complained of by the memorialists; and, if not, whether the Government will urge upon the proper authorities the desirability of prompt action in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The inquiry in which the hon. Member is interested will form one of a series on the same subject which the Inspectors of Fisheries intend to hold as soon as ever their engagements will permit of their doing so.

POST OFFICE—MAILS TO THE OUTER ISLES (SCOTLAND).

Mr. MACFARLANE (Argyll) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the reason why the steamer carrying the mails to the outer isles does not call at Tobermory was because the Government was informed that the pier dues would amount to £100 or £150 per annum; and, whether it is the fact that the Post Office official who visited the district was informed that the pier dues would not exceed £50?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): The expediency of requiring the mail steamer to call at Tobermory did not depend exclusively upon the amount of pier dues payable. Other considerations influenced the Postmaster General in refusing the application. No officer of the Post Office was informed that the pier dues would not exceed £50 a-year.

Mr. MACFARLANE asked if the hon. Gentleman could state what the dues would amount to if the steamers called there?

Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER: No, I could not.

FISHING PRIVILEGES (SCOTLAND)—RETURN.

Mr. MACFARLANE Argyll asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Return relating to fishing privileges in Scotland, granted on the 6th of February, will be laid upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.)): I hope to lay the Return in question on the Table on Monday evening.

ARMY—ARTILLERY BARRACKS AT SCARBOROUGH.

SIR GEORGE SITWELL (Scarborough) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build Artillery Barracks at Scarborough; and, if so, at what date the work is likely to be commenced?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): According to present arrangements, it is in about three months' time intended to commence the erection of barracks at Scarborough for the dépôt of the Northern Division of Royal Artillery.

BULGARIA—ALLEGED CONSPIRACY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL (Blackburn) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information has reached Her Majesty's Government on the subject of a conspiracy, alleged to have been fomented by Russian agents, and confirmed by Circular Note of the Bulgarian Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Prefects of the Province of Philippopolis, for the assassination of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria and of his Prime Minister; whether Her Majesty's Government has received any information tending to confirm the following statement, which has obtained currency from a usually well authenticated source, dated Sofia, May 22:—

"There is now little doubt that the plot against the Prince formed only part of a general conspiracy to create disturbances and produce anarchy throughout the Country, and thus furnish a pretext for a Russian occupation, which the Czar's Representative at Philippopolis has been openly promising his adherents in the near future;"

and, whether any representations have been addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Russia deprecating a course of action so calculated to disturb the peace of Europe?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BRYCE) (Aberdeen, S.): Her Majesty's Government have received information that a plot was discovered at Bourgas to waylay Prince Alexander and take him alive, if possible, on board ship, to kill the Prime Minister and Prefect of Bourgas, and to provoke a revolution. Her Majesty's Government know nothing as to any action of Russian agents in the matter, and possess no facts that would tend to justify any representation to the Government of Russia.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—GREENWICH PARK—HOURS OF OPENING.

MR. EVELYN (Deptford) asked the honourable Member for North West Staffordshire, Whether it is the fact that that Greenwich Park is not open to the public before seven a.m., to the great inconvenience of neighbouring residents, and especially of working men; and, whether, since other Royal Parks are open at five a.m., there would be any objection to placing Greenwich Park under similar regulations to those of the other Royal Parks?

MR. LEVESON GOWER (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Stafford, N.W.): This question has been considered on several occasions. Hyde Park alone is open all the year round at 5 A.M., and this can be done because the Park is under the charge of the Metropolitan Police. In the case of Greenwich Park, the opening of the gates at 5 A.M. would entail an addition to the force of Park constables employed at an estimated increase of expense of at least £150 a-year. If sufficient evidence were laid before the First Commissioner that the number of persons to be benefited by the earlier opening of the Park would justify the increased expenditure, he would be prepared to submit the matter to the Treasury in connection with the Estimates of next year; but it must be borne in mind that the question of Greenwich Park can scarcely be decided by itself, and that similar applications in regard to other Parks would, if entertained, involve a very material increase in the expenditure.

THE COLONIAL AND INDIAN EXHIBITION — DUTIES ON GOLD AND SILVER PLATE.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Duties of 17s. per ounce and 1s. 6d. per ounce respectively, have been paid on the Foreign gold and silver plate exhibited in the Colonial Exhibition; and, whether exhibitors have paid the £5 15s. charge for a Licence to deal in gold and silver plate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby): No duty has been paid upon any gold and silver plate since its deposit in the Exhibition. Up to the present time only one licence has been taken out, which is for a quarter of a year.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ARKLOW HARBOUR WORKS.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay the further Papers, a list of which has been submitted to him, in reference to Arklow Harbour, upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.): The Papers for which the hon. Member has asked will be included in those about to be presented to the House on the subject of Arklow Harbour, with one exception—namely, a Report from the Commissioners of Public Works to the Treasury.

POST OFFICE—ABSTRACTION OF NEWSPAPERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Is the Postmaster General aware that during the past ten years frequent complaints have been made of the abstraction of large numbers of newspapers, sent by people in this Country to their relatives abroad, particularly in India and Australia; whether he has heard that these newspapers are taken out and read by people on board ship; and, whether the postal authorities have ever made special efforts to discover the culprits, and with what results?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.): Such complaints have on two occasions been made to the Post Office, but on investigation they have proved to be unfounded. If the hon. Member will furnish the Postmaster General with the particulars of any case of the kind which has come to his knowledge, it shall be fully investigated.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA—THE JOINT COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government had made up their minds what was to be done about the Government of India Committee, the Motion for which had been on the Paper for months?

Mr. Bryce

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): On the termination of the debate, which is to be resumed to-night, we shall be in a position then to say what shall be done.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL—POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W. : Sir, last night the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister referred me to the ordinary channels of information for a full report of the statement made by him at a certain meeting held yesterday, and he also said in this House that he had stated that—

“No application would be made to the House to take further steps in the prosecution of the Government of Ireland Bill within the compass of the ordinary Session of Parliament.”

That was a rather mysterious answer, and on referring to the report this morning of the right hon. Gentleman's speech I find that the right hon. Gentleman himself explained that it was susceptible of two interpretations. One would be to keep the Bill alive for the purpose of proceeding in the autumn with the principal clauses in it; and the other would be to allow the Session to be wound up, and to summon Parliament again on an early day for a fresh Session, and in that fresh Session to re-introduce the Bill with the necessary Amendments. The right hon. Gentleman is reported to have gone on to say that he was “inclined to think that the latter would be the better course.” My Question is, which of these two courses do Her Majesty's Government propose to adopt?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has quoted from a report—which I have no doubt is either perfectly or substantially correct—of the words used by me yesterday, and he has also quoted with perfect accuracy the answer made by me to him yesterday in this House. I did point out yesterday at the Foreign Office that there were two methods by which effect might be given to what we might consider to be our duty in the prosecution of this great subject, consistently with the promise I made as a positive announcement, that we should not, after the second reading, ask the House to take any further steps for the prosecution of the remaining stages of the Bill within the limits of an ordinary Session. One of these methods was reserving the consideration of the Bill in Committee in an Autumn Sitting; and the other method was to allow the Bill to lapse during the present Session and to advise Her Majesty to summon Parliament at a very early period for the purpose of the immediate reintroduction of the Bill. I also stated, and I think I had the authority of my Colleagues for doing so, that we were inclined to prefer the latter method. I do think that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) will feel that I ought not to be called upon at this moment to make a statement which might involve the Prorogation of Parliament and its reassembling in reply to a mere question in Parliament a more positive announcement than that I have now made. Reference must be made elsewhere before I proceed to give that authoritative information to the House; but there is nothing at all improper in asking for that information, and on an early day I may be in a position to give it.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The answer of the right hon. Gentleman is so unsatisfactory that I feel bound to ask the leave of the House to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the statements of Her Majesty's Government as to the future proceedings on the Government of Ireland Bill.

The pleasure of the House not having been signified—

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman proposes to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing “a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the statements of Her Majesty's Government as to the future proceedings on the Government of Ireland Bill.” I have to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is supported by 40 Members?

And not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen in their places:—

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I may venture to remind the House that throughout the whole consideration of this important question of the future

Government of Ireland there is one thing which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) has put prominently in the foreground as the main justification of his proposals, and that is the extreme urgency of grappling with the question of the restoration of social order in Ireland. In his speech on the second reading of this Bill, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the change which he proposed in the Government of Ireland was "proposed by him in order to meet the first necessity of civilized society." The right hon. Gentleman said—

"Social order is not broken up in Ireland—it is undermined—it is sapped, and by general and universal confession it imperatively requires to be dealt with."

That is the state of things, the urgency of which surely nothing can exceed, to remedy which the right hon. Gentleman has introduced the Government of Ireland Bill and the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill. Now, Her Majesty's Government took their time—I do not say that they took too much time—in preparing the schemes which they have submitted to the House. The right hon. Gentleman framed a definite plan; he asked the House to come to close quarters with this great question. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] We criticized what we thought the fugitive vitality of this measure. To us it seemed to partake of something of the nature of a dissolving view. But these criticisms were met almost with ridicule by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He told the country that it had before it a Cabinet "determined in its purpose" and with an "intelligible plan," with the advantage as to aim and principle of "speaking with one voice." He and his Colleagues criticized—indeed, that was the main staple of their speeches on these Bills—the position of those hon. Members who sit on these Benches, of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). We were told that no one of us had any plan for dealing with the future of Ireland. But, Sir, Her Majesty's Government made it their boast that they had a plan, and that that plan held the field. Does it hold the field now? If so, why is it that it is either to be withdrawn altogether, or to be postponed till such an indefinite period that certainly the urgency of the restoration of social order cannot now be present to the minds of Her Majesty's Government? We are not to be asked, Sir, if I rightly interpret the answer which the right hon. Gentleman has made to me this evening, to vote on the second reading of a definite plan, but to give an indefinite vote on some principle of autonomy for Ireland which no one can explain or put into shape. When Mr. Butt proposed his schemes for Home Rule in Ireland, what was our invariable reply to them? "Give us a definite plan, and then we will tell you what we think about it." How did the right hon. Gentleman characterize Mr. Butt's proposals in 1874? He said—

"It is a dangerous and tricky system for Parliament to adopt—to encounter national dissatisfaction, with the assurance which may mean anything or nothing—which may perhaps conciliate the feelings of the people of Ireland for a moment and attract a passing breath of popularity, but which, when the day of trial comes, may be found entirely to fail. It is a method of proceeding which, whatever Party may be in power, or whatever measures may be adopted, I trust this House will never condescend to adopt."—(3 Hansard, [218] 131.)

That is the very method of proceeding to which he asks the House now to condescend. Why is this Bill to be practically withdrawn? Is it to be withdrawn, or only to be postponed? Has the right hon. Gentleman found it so impracticable that nobody will vote for it, and therefore he is compelled to deprive the vote on the second reading of any meaning? [Cries of "No!"] Then, why is it to be withdrawn or postponed? Why is the plan of the Government for dealing with this great question of urgency, this important question of social order in Ireland, to be put off for five months till October? What is that but to paralyze the forces of law and order in Ireland, to prolong the uncertainty as to the future, which, from whatever point of view you regard it, must be a great national evil—a peril to the whole social and economic fabric in that country? Why is the Bill to be remodelled? How is it to be remodelled? What have we got before us? I have heard of Governments which have proposed abstract Resolutions instead of Bills, and have been strongly censured by the right hon. Gentleman for so doing. But I never yet heard of a Government which brought forward a Bill containing a definite scheme for a great Constitutional change—which boasted that that scheme held the field, and then proposed to withdraw it after getting the consent of the House to it as a mere abstract, indefinite Resolution. That is what I venture to call trifling with Parliament—it is trifling with one of the gravest Constitutional questions with which Parliament can be called on to deal; and, above all, it is trifling with the first duty of the Government—which is to maintain and restore social order in Ireland. Why is it done? Suppose the second reading of this Bill to be carried, what will it be? Why, it will be a “Continuance in Office Bill.” This course is to be followed in order that Her Majesty’s Government may sit on that Bench without the power of carrying out the policy they have proclaimed. That is a course which should be repudiated by this House, as, I believe, when it is understood, it will be repudiated by the country. That the House may be able to mark its sense of the policy which Her Majesty’s Government have adopted, and to extract something like a real definition from the right hon. Gentleman as to what that policy is, I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House do now adjourn.”
(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am struck, Sir, in the first instance, by the warmth with which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has found it necessary to address the House; but as I do not believe that the introduction of warmth into these debates in the slightest degree improves the prospect or diminishes the difficulty of dealing with very great questions of State policy, he will excuse me if I studiously avoid all imitation of him in that respect. I must admit there is nothing more easy, and to certain persons nothing is more attractive, than to point a speech by the imputation of offensive motives. The right hon. Gentleman, not satisfied with introducing this discussion, thinks fit to pronounce—and probably hon. Gentlemen behind him are ready to cheer when I refer to his announcement—that obviously the motives of the Government in the decision they are supposed to have arrived at is to insure their own continuance in Office. They prefer that to all the considerations connected with the great issue before them, and their minds, in fact, are of such a mean and degrading order that they can alone be acted upon, not by motives of honour and duty, but simply by those of selfishness and personal interest. Sir, I do not condescend to discuss that imputation. In my opinion, the dart aimed at our shield, being such a dart as that, is “Telum imbelles sine ictu.” If we had not lived our lives in the face of the public, and if the public, or, at all events, as we think, the predominating portion of the nation that gives us its confidence, should for one moment suppose us to be capable of being influenced by such considerations, the mere denial of them would not prevail. I do not think I am bound to say—I hope it is not pride—but it is the experience of the generous confidence of my fellow-countrymen, which makes me know that such a denial and such repudiation of such an imputation is totally unnecessary. I leave the right hon. Gentleman to the enjoyment in his own mind of his accusations. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says that I have treated this question from the first as one of the utmost urgency, and as a question of social order. It is true, Sir, we have so regarded it, and upon that ground we have urged and shall continue to urge it. But I must observe that social order has been acted upon by the course which the Government have already taken, by the pledges that they have given, and by the prospects of the solemn declaration which they intend to ask the House to make. Social order in Ireland is in about the same state as it was last autumn, when that was contemplated with such complacency by the Members of the late Government. [Sir Michael Hicks-Beach dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but if he will let me conclude my sentence I will say with such complacency that when they met Parliament they did not find themselves able to make any announcement on the subject to Parliament in the Speech from the Throne. Such was the condition of Ireland with regard to social order, and such is the condition of Ireland with regard to social order now. No acute crisis with regard to social order in Ireland has been reached, as it was about to be reached, and infallibly, in my opinion, would have been reached, when the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues made their famous declaration of January 26. Were the people of Ireland to entertain a doubt as to the earnestness of the Government in the prosecution of this great and important task—were the people of Ireland to be disappointed in the expectations they entertain of the great and solemn declaration by Parliament in favour of their self-government as to Irish matters—then, indeed, we should arrive at a position of difficulty. But I rely upon the people of Ireland to know and to believe that so long as we are acting in good faith for the speediest possible prosecution of this subject, they will themselves rally round the constituted authorities of the country, and enable us still to plead their cause with those appeals to the generosity and prudence of Englishmen and Scotchmen which we have thus far been able to urge. With regard to how far we are to ask this House to press forward, from week to week, or even from month to month, a subject of this kind, it is necessary that the Executive Government should upon their responsibility exercise their own discretion, subject to the correction of the House. As the right hon. Gentleman has read what I stated yesterday, I may refer him to a portion he has not mentioned. We cannot arrive at the second reading of this Bill—probably, though, I have no right or authority to name a day for the division—I assume we cannot arrive at a division before June 1. We have to consider what demand we could fairly make upon the House with regard to the prosecution of its ulterior stages; and we have also to consider this important fact—that in perfectly good faith a large number of Members of this House, who are determined friends of the principles of the Bill, have said that they require more time for the consideration of its provisions. [Ironical cheers and laughter.] I speak in their hearing and without contradiction. I believe I am only giving utterance to a sentiment which is rather widely spread upon this side of the House; certainly it is a sentiment the utterance of which has reached me through a multitude of channels; and as the right hon. Gentleman has reminded me with perfect justice of the urgency which I have ascribed to this question, I must remind him of the novelty which he and his Friends have ascribed to it, and of the unpreparedness of Parliament which they and even Gentlemen on this side of the House have constantly alleged for its consideration. But apart from that demand for time, I am bound to look at the nature and character of this Bill, which, although it is not a very bulky Bill, yet contains, in my opinion, a mass of matter, almost every line involving some new proposition—[Ironical cheers from the Opposition—] exactly so—which justifies, and even requires, very prolonged consideration on the part of this House. I may remind this House of what took place five years ago upon a Bill which, I think, difficult as it was and complicated as it was, did not require more consideration at the hands of this House than the present Bill. I mean the Irish Land Bill of 1881. Now, Sir, if my memory serves me right, the House spent more than 50 days of deliberation upon that Bill, and more than 30 days in Committee upon that Bill. I ask what would be our prospects, and how should we be treating the House, and how should we be treating the subject, even were we to endeavour to force forward this Bill at a time of the year when, with reasonable and proper discussion and deliberation, it could not be passed through its ordinary stages within the period which physical as well as social necessities impose upon this House as the annual limit of its arduous labours? Why, Sir, in a case of this kind it may be, and I believe distinctly that in this case it is, the best policy, with a view to expedition and despatch, with a view to attaining with the greatest speed the goal which we hope to reach—it is the best policy, I believe, not to make an untimely and unseasonable demand of that kind. Sir, we have had warnings upon that subject. This Bill has not only to be passed through the House of Commons, but it has to be dealt with in “another place.” [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!] Yes, the noble Lord cheers me, and I daresay he is tolerably well aware of the point to which I am about to refer. We know perfectly well that every point that can be taken will be taken against this Bill, and, among others, that of its unseasonable prosecution. What happened to the Ballot Bill? The Ballot Bill was sent to the House of Lords—a measure which we of the House of Commons should have supposed the House of Lords might have disposed of—and it did finally dispose of it—in a very few days: yet still, because we sent that Bill to the House of Lords within the first week or 10 days of August—I do not remember the exact day—advantage was taken of that fact to dismiss the Bill for a year. Sir, we do not wish to expose ourselves to risks of that kind. We do not wish to have collateral issues raised upon this Bill. We have raised one of the greatest issues ever submitted to Parliament and the country, and our desire is to keep that issue clear. We feel convinced that as long as we can keep it clear before the nation, and prevent it from being mixed up with other collateral issues, with plausible considerations derived from our mode of managing Business, derived from our unfortunate choice of times for submitting it to the one House or the other—as long as we can avoid this, we have before us a conflict in which we are prepared to go through to the end, and in which we are perfectly confident of the final issue. But, Sir, we will not adopt our rules of tactics from the suggestions of the Opposition. We will give reasonable consideration, as far as we can, to the demands of friends of the Bill. We are, in the conclusion we have arrived at, doing our best, judging for the best, according to our faculties and according to our means, as to the mode by which we should soonest reach the final consummation of this great question. Now, Sir, I might have said to the right hon. Gentleman that this was altogether a premature discussion. I should have thought the time to discuss our proceedings upon the second reading of the Bill was when the Bill had been read a second time: but I do not think fit to take any objection of that kind, because I know I should be open to the reproach, or at least the reproach would certainly be made, that I was endeavouring to evade the issue. But I tell the right hon. Gentleman that we are exercising our best judgment as to the most efficient and effectual means of prosecuting this great subject, and that in the exercise of that judgment we shall choose for ourselves our means and our times of action, and we shall not adopt advice with regard to them from those whom we know to be opposed to the principle of our measure, and whom we know to be too ready—as we have had a proof to-night—of taking every collateral and secondary objection to the Bill. Another point has been raised by the right hon. Gentleman. He says we are going to give an indefinite vote. He says there is a promise—I do not know that he used the word—but he says this Bill is going to be remodelled. He did not read that in the report of my speech this morning. I think that happy word, as applied to the structure of the Bill, is a pure invention of the right hon. Gentleman. I am not aware that there is a shadow or a shred of authority for any such statement.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord says “reconstructed” was the word. It is quite true that the word “reconstructed” was used. [Opposition cheers and laughter.] What confidence these Gentlemen who use those means of opposition must have in the rectitude of their own cause and in the far-seeing character of their own statesmanship! The word “reconstructed” was used. Does the noble Lord dare to say it was used with respect to the Bill? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Yes.] Never! It was used with respect to one particular clause of the Bill. This grand attack, founded upon the fact that our Bill was to be remodelled, fails. What a woeful collapse! It is not the Bill that is to be remodelled, it appears, after all. I give the right hon. Gentleman some credit for it, because he had not the patience to read through the report he saw in the papers. He was wearied to death in reading the speech made by me. But the noble Lord spoke boldly, as if he had read it, and now it comes out that he read it wrong. He quotes it wrong, and then, having alleged the remodelling of the Bill, he is obliged to fall back upon the reconstruction of a clause. It was on one clause alone. I am not quite sure, but I think I remember another clause, and possibly other passages of the Bill. I am not quite sure that there are not some other passages of the Bill which would fall under my description with regard to reconstruction. But the whole of those, as I stated yesterday in the most distinct terms, are exclusively upon one point of the Bill. I certainly did not exclude Gentlemen from the advantage of any Amendment, compatible with the scope and purpose of the Bill, which we might be able to avail ourselves of if the advantage of time were secured. But the point to which alone reconstruction was to apply was so much of the Bill as touches the future relation of the Representatives of Ireland, whether Peers or Commoners, to the Imperial Parliament. I believe that was made perfectly and absolutely clear. I am a little surprised that the acute intellects on the opposite side of the House should have found themselves puzzled with this portion of the alphabet of the subject. Then the right hon. Gentleman quotes words against me that apply to an abstract Resolution, and he says we are to ask the House to vote for something which is of the nature of an abstract Resolution—something or other about autonomy in Ireland which nobody can understand and nobody can define. At any rate, we have been able to define the subject of this autonomy in Ireland sufficiently to arouse the very determined and, perhaps, a little embittered hostility of hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I do not understand why they should complain so much of the absence of definition. Unhappily, many of those on this side of the House have likewise found our description of the Bill sufficiently definite to array them in a most deliberate and determined opposition—a most important section of the Liberal Party, which I am afraid we have no hope of mollifying or converting. But, Sir, our definitions, as I have often said, may have varied in terms, though I believe they have never varied in substance. If I had been aware of the right hon. Gentleman's intention, I would, for greater accuracy, have brought down the note I made of the very words which I used yesterday in regard to the principal purpose and scope of this Bill, which principal purpose and scope I stated yesterday, and I state again, that no consideration will induce us to vary or depart from by one hair's-breadth. The purpose is to obtain from Parliament, if we are able, the establishment of a Legislative Body in Ireland for the effectual management and control of Irish, as distinct from Imperial, affairs. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says we are going to ask for an abstract Resolution. Now, Sir, we are going to ask for the very thing that has always been put by me in contrast to an abstract Resolution—that is to say, for a Vote having reference to a Bill before Parliament. It is perfectly true that on the second reading of a Bill you do not affirm all the provisions, or even the most important provisions, of the Bill. A very lax doctrine has, as I showed yesterday, prevailed on the other side of the House with regard to that subject. Lord Beaconsfield, with respect to a measure of the utmost importance, said, in assenting to the second reading of the measure—it was the Land Act of 1870—that he affirmed nothing; but that there ought to be a change in the Land Laws. That is a very lax doctrine indeed, and is something like reducing the second reading of a Bill to the passing of an abstract Resolution. But, Sir, we have not stood upon that. We have said that the second reading of the Bill is a solemn pledge from Parliament to the people of the three countries, and most of all the people of Ireland, to the effect that a certain thing of vital consequence ought to be done, and that Parliament intends to do it, and to do it at the earliest moment which the circumstances in which it stands will permit. What is the charge of the right hon. Gentleman? I have not endeavoured to reduce the meaning of a vote on the second reading below that which, according to all sound and established Parliamentary doctrines, it is known to bear. On the contrary, I have stated as strongly as possible that we conceive that nothing can be more distinct and definite, either as to substance or as to time, than the promise and engagement which this House and those voting for the second reading will give by that vote—first of all, that they think that a Parliament for the management of Irish affairs—or as a Legislative Body as we have called it—ought to be established; and, secondly, that it is their duty and their intention, at the first available moment, to set about establishing it. Now, Sir, that is the position of the Government; and if the right hon. Gentleman tells me that we ought to sit through July and August—we met early in January—September and October for that purpose, I do not believe that such a demand can be fairly made upon a Legislative Body. There are limits;

happily, these limits are prescribed. There never has been a Legislative Chamber in the world which worked so hard as the House of Commons. But we must observe some limits in the demands which we make upon it, and to endeavour to make a partial progress, and then to be compelled to come to an exhausted House and to say that, after all, we find we cannot reach the third reading of the Bill, or, worse still, to send it to "another place" with the advantage to its opponents of the pretext of time—no, Sir; that is a mode of generalship upon which we do not intend to act. If we have judged wrongly in this matter the House will correct us. I do not believe we have judged wrongly; I do not believe the House thinks we have judged wrongly; and I believe this—if we had judged wrongly, if we had made some great error of tactic in the management and prosecution of this Bill, if we had been chargeable with some grievous fault, the right hon. Gentleman would not have found it at all necessary to interpose to-day with a Motion for Adjournment, but would probably have sat with folded arms, delighted to see how we walked into some one of the many snares set for us. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says, in order to mark his sense of our proceedings, that he will move the adjournment of the House. Well, he has moved it. I am very glad he has, and, in order to mark our sense of the proceedings, we will negative the adjournment. These proceedings are entirely within precedent, and we ask the House to approve what, according to all sound Parliamentary doctrine, is its known and usual method of action; and if we can form any judgment under the most solemn responsibility as to the best method of going forward to attain the great end before us, we believe that we have chosen that method, and that our having chosen it is in truth the reason why the right hon. Gentleman has found it necessary to assail us.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, Paddington, S.: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has, I think, altogether mis-apprehended, and, for aught I know, not unintentionally mis-apprehended, the purpose of the inquiry of my right hon. Friend Sir Michael Hicks Beach, and the purpose of the Motion which he has made this evening. What my right hon. Friend wished to inquire about was not the motives of the Government or the policy of the Government with regard to this particular Bill in the past. What he inquired about, and had a right to inquire about—and even the Prime Minister will admit that he occupies a responsible position—was the nature of the procedure which the Government proposed to adopt with regard to the future proceedings on the Bill. That, every hon. Member will admit, is a legitimate subject for inquiry. The First Lord of the Treasury stated that there was nothing unprecedented in the action of the Government, and that it was well within precedent. I defy the Prime Minister, with all his Parliamentary knowledge and experience, to show to the House a single precedent for the course which he apparently intends to adopt. Can the right hon. Gentleman point to any measure of first-class importance—any measure of overwhelming importance such as this—being introduced by a Government, and then an offer being made to the House—"If you will vote for the second reading of this Bill we will withdraw the Bill, and you shall never hear of the Bill again." It is quite true this is accompanied by another indication—that Parliament may be called together in the autumn or winter. "Winter" is the word in the Prime Minister's speech. [MR. GLADSTONE: No, no.] I read his speech with great care, and the words were—"I do not think the winter should come upon us——"

MR. INCE Islington, E.: Will the noble Lord read on?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The hon. and learned Member below the Gangway is a little premature. I was going to read on, but was interrupted by the inopportune applause. "I do not think the winter should come upon us and find us enjoying ourselves in the country." What does that mean but a Winter Session? Obviously it means this—that the autumn may come upon us and find us enjoying ourselves. But to come back to what I was saying, which was this—that the statement of the Prime Minister has been coupled with the indication that Parliament may be called together in the winter to consider a Bill which may be the same as this, or may not be the same as this Bill. [MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say that.] It may be, or may not be, the same Bill; but about it the Prime Minister has used these words—

"The proposal," alluding to some changes which he had been indicating, "the proposal will entail some further change in the construction of the clause, and the practical effect will be that it will certainly be necessary to reconstruct these clauses of the Bill."

Thus, there were several clauses, particularly the 24th, and, in a secondary degree, the 39th. Very well; how did the Attorney General treat the proposal the other day for the reconstruction of the 24th clause? He treated it as a matter affecting the whole Bill; and more than that, the right hon. Gentleman knows that if the proposed reconstruction of the 24th clause did not affect the construction of the whole Bill, he would not have got one single one of those who agree with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) to support him on the second reading. The right hon. Gentleman is speaking with two voices altogether in this matter; and the House must really, in common fairness, allow the Party on this side to protest against a procedure of that kind. He has indicated to the Irish Members that the Bill will be practically the same; but he holds out the hope of the withdrawal and re-introduction of the Bill in the winter. [Cries of "No!" and "Autumn!"] We are getting some information. The two voices are a voice to the Irish Members that the Bill is not to be reconstructed, and a voice to hon. Members below the Gangway that the Bill is to be reconstructed. Without doubt, the tactics of the right hon. Gentleman are of this nature, and it is for this reason that we complain that they are tactics directed to this purpose—namely, to confuse the House of Commons, to lead the House of Commons on step by step, though, at the same time, not showing to the House of Commons whither it is being led. At any rate, that is a perfectly legitimate construction. Now, mark; my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) asks of the Prime Minister—"Which of the two alternatives does the Government propose to adopt—the adjournment of the Bill to the autumn, or the Prorogation of Parliament early in July, and the introduction of a new Bill in the autumn?" That is a perfectly legitimate subject of inquiry. It is a vital point—obviously vital with the second reading. If the Bill is to be adjourned and proceeded with in the autumn as we leave it now, obviously hon. Members who wish to reconstruct it will have their facilities for so doing enormously limited. Their chances will be exceedingly poor; in fact, to those who have any experience, whatever the advantages the Government possess in Committee after the second reading, it will be apparent that their chances will be practically nil. I can quite understand that many of those who sympathize with this Bill would vote for the second reading if that course were to be adopted, but might seriously question the propriety of assenting to the second reading now if the other course is to be adopted. The other course is the Prorogation of Parliament, and the introduction of a totally new Bill in the autumn. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] Well, totally new in so far as the stages of the Bill are concerned. In the latter case, there is all the difference in the world, and everybody would start perfectly free. It would be open to hon. Members to take no part in any further debate on this subject, to take no part in any division, and to come back to the House of Commons perfectly free to take whatever part they liked with regard to the new Bill in the autumn. But that course is not open to hon. Members if the proceeding of an Adjournment of the Session is to be followed. Now, was there anything unreasonable in my right hon. Friend putting that question to the Government before we are asked to take one of the most solemn decisions which the House of Commons can possibly take? Does the right hon. Gentleman say that the Leader of the Opposition has not a right to know—before he advises those who place confidence in him what course they are to take—what are the future intentions of the Government with regard to this great measure? How can hon. Gentlemen opposite complain of our making such an inquiry? How can they complain when, in order to protest against the refusal of information, my right hon. Friend moves the Adjournment of the House? Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister made one or two remarks of a general character on which really I must be allowed for a moment to comment. He talked about the impossibility of proceeding with this Bill after a second reading this Session.

Why? If the right hon. Gentleman will present to the House of Commons a fair issue, if he will stick to his guns, from one day to another, if he will proceed with his legislation in the traditional Parliamentary manner, he will find no obstruction from this side of the House—nothing but fair Parliamentary opposition. But when all the traditional Parliamentary procedure is abandoned, when we are being jockeyed, when the House of Commons is not allowed to come to a clear issue, then it is that we may, in the defence of the ordinary rights of a minority, be forced to have recourse to all the proceedings which a minority can command. But the right hon. Gentleman says that he has no time. Why has he no time? To whom is it principally due that this debate has been so protracted? Who refused to take it de die in diem—absolutely refused? Who interposed every obstacle which Parliamentary experience and ingenuity could suggest? Why, Sir, if it had not been for the obstacles interposed by the Prime Minister himself, we might have divided on this Bill a week ago. And what is the remedy? "The question," says the Prime Minister,

"is very urgent. I still hold to that doctrine of extreme urgency; but we have no time to deal with it this summer, and we will, therefore, put off further dealing with it till the end of the year."

[Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no! Really, the Prime Minister seems very captious about dates. Well, they will put off dealing with the Bill, then, until some period or other in the future marked out for us by those "limitations which are imposed by the revolutions of the heavenly bodies." Certainly nothing could be more indefinite than that phrase. The Prime Minister complained of want of time, and he says—

"We will not send it up to the House of Lords in August, because the House of Lords will seek refuge in the excuse that they cannot consider the measure in the time at their disposal."

Sir, I dare say the Prime Minister is far better acquainted with Peers than I am. He has made a great many, and therefore he would have more right to pronounce upon the probable views of the House of Lords than I have; but I think it is perfectly certain that, whatever course the House of Lords may take with regard to this Bill, it will not be based upon any such frivolous excuse as that; and if the Prime Minister likes to proceed with this Bill, and send it up to the House of Lords in the month of August, I am perfectly convinced that he need not have the smallest fear whatever that the question of time will be in any degree raised. I have not a doubt about it that the consideration by the House of Lords of this Bill will be serious, solemn, immediate, and final. But the Prime Minister said it is altogether premature to discuss the proceedings of the Government on the second reading. [Cheers from below the Gangway.] That is cheered by hon. Members below the Gangway. The Prime Minister said that we ought to have discussed them after the second reading. That would have been altogether too late. This consideration the Prime Minister does not seem to have thought of. But who has set us the example of discussing the proceedings of the Government on the second reading? Why, the First Lord of the Treasury himself. What did he do? He summoned a meeting of his supporters at the Foreign Office. Mark, that was not a private meeting, but a meeting of an essentially public character. [Cries of "No, no!"] I call a meeting—a meeting of a public character when you have an official reporter present, who supplies an authentic report of what passed to the public Press; and if that is not a public meeting, really I do not know what is a public meeting. And at this public meeting the Prime Minister announced to a certain number of his supporters a definite line of policy with much deliberation and detail; but he absolutely refuses to give that information in an official manner to the House of Commons. Now, again, I ask the First Lord of the Treasury, can he point to any analogous proceeding by a Prime Minister with regard to a first-class measure in the whole course of his long experience? I venture to say he cannot. I do think I should not have complained if Parliament had been immediately put in possession of the same information that his supporters were put in possession of; what I do complain of, and what I think is altogether insulting to the House of Commons, is this—that certain information with regard to the future conduct of this measure is given to a certain group of the House of Commons, and is refused to the whole body of the House of Commons. At the present moment, though the Prime Minister knows that numbers of votes may depend upon whether he makes a definite statement or not, he absolutely refuses, under the most frivolous and ridiculous pretext, to tell the House whether he intends to adjourn the Bill to the autumn, or whether he intends to prorogue Parliament very soon and introduce a new Bill in the winter. And that is what we complain of, and have a right to complain of. That is what we wish to draw the attention of the country to. You say you want to go to the country. If you want to go to the country to get the opinion of the country on this measure you need not take more than five or six weeks about it. Nothing would be easier. You can proceed to divide on the second reading, and if you are not satisfied with the result of the division dissolve Parliament. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bryce), in the speech which has been so much praised, began by saying how anxious the Government was to fly to the opinion of the country, and this was received with the loudest possible cheers below the Gangway on both sides. Why do not the Government go to the country? Because all these proceedings are designed in order to keep the question away from the country, and in order to prevent the country giving an opinion upon it. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Members opposite are supposed to be shaky in their independence about this Bill. Why? What has been the great bribe offered by the Prime Minister—a bribe as great as any offered at the time of the Act of Union?—"If you vote for the second reading of a Bill which you do not approve of in your hearts, and which you disbelieve in, I promise you that, at any rate, for another eight, nine, or 12 months you shall not be sent back to your constituencies." This is the noble policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and these are the noble motives by which he appeals on behalf of the Government to the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland—"Vote for anything you like; you are committed to nothing."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: What? Then they are committed.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Certainly.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The Prime Minister surprises me. I did not think it possible to be surprised by the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister contend, from a Parliamentary point of view, that hon. Members, by voting for the second reading of the Bill, can be committed to the Bill if that Bill dies and is withdrawn?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The principle of the Bill.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Never. Never was such a view held in Parliament before. I venture to say never, and that is why the Prime Minister holds out to hon. Members the bribe that if they will only vote for the principle of the Bill, which they disapprove of and which is going to be withdrawn, and possibly never heard of again, he will consent to give them a little longer lease of Parliamentary life. These are the manœuvres, Sir, which are being adopted by the Government to settle one of the gravest questions ever brought before Parliament—manœuvres which, of course, we must expect from an "old Parliamentary hand," but manœuvres which I certainly should not have expected from one who was brought up in such a school of statesmanship as the First Lord of the Treasury; manœuvres which, I feel certain, Lord Grey never would have contemplated, which Lord Althorp never would have contemplated, which Sir Robert Peel never would have contemplated, and which, I believe, he himself, some years ago, would not have contemplated. The House has been very kind to allow me to make these remarks in defence of the course which has been taken by my right hon. Friend. I have heard many Motions for the Adjournment of the House moved, but none more defensible, none so defensible, as the present one. I say that the House cannot go to a division on the second reading of this Bill; it cannot properly, decently, or safely continue this debate, unless the Government will deal fully, fairly, and frankly with the House, and will say what course they will pursue after the second reading has been either agreed to or rejected. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not only take the sense of the House on this question; but I am sure, if it rested with me, and me alone, I would move Adjournment after Adjournment until I had forced the Government by the sheer pressure of the minority, and by the public opinion excited out-of-doors, to desist from this policy of houcussing the House of Commons.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, Derby: The noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) has given us a great deal of advice, and has addressed to us a good many taunts; but I can assure him that in the conduct of this measure we shall neither be guided by his advice nor influenced by his taunts. It seems to me that the extraordinary disappointment, irritation, and impatience betrayed by hon. Gentlemen opposite is a confirmation of the wisdom of the policy that the Government are pursuing. Now, I think before this grand parade it would have been well if right hon. Gentlemen opposite had made up their minds as to what was the meaning of the Motion they have submitted to the House. The noble Lord stated that the meaning of the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman was not an inquiry into the motives of the Government. Well, that, I think, is strictly accurate, because the right hon. Gentleman made at the conclusion of his speech, not an inquiry as to the motives of the Government, but a statement on his part as to what those motives were to be. I have nothing to add to what my right hon. Friend Mr. Gladstone has said as to the motives imputed to us by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). The noble Lord, however, with his accustomed accuracy, has said that the Prime Minister affirmed that if the second reading of this Bill be granted we should never hear of the Bill again. LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Withdrawn. Well, then, the noble Lord is extremely inquisitive as to the subject of the time when we shall hear of it again. The noble Lord is a man of great eloquence and of distinguished talent, but I think there is one line in which he will never shine, and that is the line of a critic, because for a critic, at least, it is essential—although some seem to dispense with it—to appear to have read the documents which he pretends to criticize. I think that the House saw the futility of the quotation which the noble Lord made with reference to a Winter Session; but if he had read the speech of my right hon. Friend he would have seen that it pointed to two courses. He asserted that one plan would be to do what was done in 1882, when we met in the Autumn, and that the other course would be to summon Parliament again at an early day for a fresh Session. The noble Lord said—“The summoning of Parliament at an early day may mean in the winter.” On the contrary, everybody understood my right hon. Friend's intention. If the noble Lord does not understand, I have no hesitation in saying that an early day for a fresh Session meant not a meeting in the winter, but a day in the early autumn. Well, then, the noble Lord said that the object of these proceedings on the part of the Government is that the House may be led without knowing where it is to be led to. But I do not think that the House is so absolutely unintelligent as the noble Lord seems to think. At all events, the Government have never concealed the goal to which they desire the House to be led. My right hon. Friend has stated over and over again that the goal to which the Government desires the House to be led—whether it be in the summer or early autumn—is a Legislative Body in Ireland for the conduct of Irish affairs. How, then, can it be said that the course of the Government conceals from the House the direction in which it is to be led? The noble Lord said that the Government attempted to “jockey” the House. I think that the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman opposite who was late Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Henry Chaplin) must have mistaken the day; they must have thought it the day on which the House took a holiday, and must have borrowed the language of the racecourse. LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I said “houcussing.” Well, then, houcussing was the word. I believe they are both words derived from the language and phraseology of certain Bohemian tribes who are often seen. I believe, on these Downs, and it is language more appropriate to those scenes than to the debates of the House of Commons. The noble Lord is a great authority in the House of Commons; but he is also undertaking to speak for the House of Lords. He has told us in the most distinct way what is the course which the other House of Legislature will take, and not only that, but also the grounds upon which they will arrive at that decision, and that in whatever month the Bill goes to the House of Lords the House of Lords would give the final decision. I venture to think that the final decision of this question will never rest with the House of Lords at all. Then the noble Lord says that the object of this Motion is simply inquiry. We heard very little inquiry from the right hon. Gentleman. It is quite true that he referred to a point which the noble Lord seems to think was the whole object of the Motion—namely, to know whether the intention of the Government is to proceed by Adjournment or Prorogation, and as to the advice they shall tender to Her Majesty on the subject? On that subject there was no ambiguity in the language of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister either yesterday or to-day; but, really, it is a very astonishing thing that there should be two Gentlemen who are Privy Counsellors, who have held Office under the Crown, who should imagine that it is possible for a Minister of the Crown to announce a decision on the subject either of Dissolution or of Prorogation without direct and distinct authority from the Crown. Really, I am astonished that it should be necessary to give the right hon. Gentlemen elementary lessons on the principles of the Constitution of this country. My right hon. Friend has said everything that it is possible or proper for him to say on such a subject as this, and no Motion for Adjournment ought to induce any Minister to say more on that subject than he has said. The noble Lord was very severe on the Party meeting at the Foreign Office. He says that Party meetings are never held of that character with reference to Bills which have been promised in Parliament, or which are in progress in Parliament.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: What I said was that information of so remarkable a character as appears to have been communicated at the Party meeting ought also to have been communicated immediately afterwards to the House of Commons if the meeting were of a public character.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not know what the noble Lord means by meetings of a public character. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Really, I think that a little decency might be observed, and that one might be allowed to conclude one's sentence. A meeting may be public in two senses. It may mean a meeting where everybody is admitted. That was not the character of the meeting at the Foreign Office at all. No, Sir; nobody was invited to that meeting who was irreconcilably hostile to the establishment of a Legislative Body in Ireland. That was the principle on which that meeting was founded. All friends to that principle and Members of the Party on this side of the House were invited to that meeting. The transactions of that meeting were allowed to be made public; and, according to my recollection, that is an extremely common thing in meetings of that character with reference to Bills in progress in Parliament, and with reference to the most important Bills. I can remember that in 1867 more than one meeting of that character was held by Mr. Disraeli and his Party with very important results on the conduct of the Bill then pending. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Private meetings.] They were no more private meetings than this was. The speeches at those meetings were reported, and the results were made public. That, at least, is my recollection of the matter. The noble Lord has again challenged our course with reference to this Bill. One would think he had never heard of the authors of the Ten Minutes' Bill, or of the authors of Resolutions which were withdrawn, and of new Bills introduced and withdrawn, when he said that no such modifications of such an important character had ever been made before. The noble Lord says that it is contrary to all Parliamentary doctrine to say that in voting for a Bill which disappears, but re-appears again in a future Session, you are committed to anything. The noble Lord lays that down as if it were a proposition not capable of being disputed; but I think his proposition must be considerably modified before it can be accepted. Let me give the noble Lord an example. We had of recent years Bills before us for household suffrage in the counties over and over again in former Parliaments. Does the noble Lord mean to say that a Member of this House who voted for the second reading of such Bills, to give the suffrage to the county householder on the same footing as it was given to the town householder, were not committed to the principle of household suffrage in the counties, even although the Bill for which he voted disappeared? I think he will find few people to agree with him. I apprehend that the vote for the second reading was the affirmation of a principle which would endure to a future Session. What is the meaning, then, of this Motion? The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has said that he has brought forward this Motion for Adjournment—I think these were his words—"to mark the sense of the House of the conduct of the Government." [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Hear, hear!] Very well, we accept his Motion in that sense; that is, he has made this Motion for Adjournment to mark the sense of the House of the conduct of the Government. We invite the right hon. Gentleman to take an issue upon it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: [Lancashire, Rossendale:] Sir, I do not think that the Government or the House can be very much astonished or have any reason to complain that this Motion has been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. It is not necessary, I think, to discuss whether the Motion has been made with the view of enabling the House to "mark its sense of the conduct pursued by the Government;" but, at all events, it is a recognized and certainly not an inconvenient practice that an opportunity of this kind should be taken for the purpose of endeavouring to elicit and obtain some information from the Government as to the course they intend to take upon a matter of very great public importance. Now, Sir, no one can doubt that announcements of very great public importance, which may probably affect the conduct of hon. Members upon this measure and the fate of the Bill, were made in an unofficial form to hon. Members of this House yesterday; and it is very desirable that some information—or, if possible, further information—should be communicated to the whole House before it proceeds to the reconsideration of the Bill. We are already placed in a position of very considerable inconvenience and embarrassment. We have been debating the second reading of this Bill for more than a fortnight under one set of circumstances and under peculiar conditions, and we are now going to resume the debate on the Bill, and to be asked to give a decision on the Bill under circumstances very different indeed, and a very large number of those who have already addressed the House have addressed it under circumstances altogether different from those now before them. I think the right hon. Gentleman asked a question which was a reasonable question, and which I should have expected my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) would have been able to answer more fully than either he or the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt) has done. The right hon. Gentleman only referred in his speech to the necessity which he and the Government felt of giving the House more time for the consideration of this measure after the second reading. But, as he pointed out yesterday and again to-day, there are two different ways in which that additional time may be given. Either the House might be asked to adjourn after a certain time, and to resume the consideration of this Bill in an Autumn Session, or else the House might be asked to wind up the present Business in order that there might be an early Prorogation, and that a new Bill—a new measure—should be produced in the autumn, which should go through a first reading, a second reading, and all the stages of a Bill. Now, Sir, surely when these two subjects of proceeding are under the consideration of the Government it is not unreasonable that the House should ask to know, before it gives a decision on the second reading, the main and leading principles contained in it. Which of these courses do the Government intend to adopt? The Government have spoken as if it involved only a difference of procedure; but I must say I entirely agree with what was said on the other side—that the difference appears to me to be absolutely vital. If we are going to continue the consideration of this Bill in an Autumn Session after a second reading, not only will our opportunities for asking for modifications and vital alterations in the Bill be very greatly curtailed, but also the individual freedom of action of Members will be limited; because they will have consented not merely to the principle—what is defined by my right hon. Friend as the principle—of the Bill, but they will have committed themselves to the main and leading principles contained in the Bill. On the other hand, if the Prorogation takes place and a new Bill is introduced, we shall all retain a very much greater degree of individual liberty. It will be open to us to discuss the Bill on its introduction and on the second reading; but now to say that we are going to take the second reading, and not to be told till after that whether we are to go on with the consideration of this Bill or a new Bill, appears to me to be asking the House to do that which is not reasonable.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say a new Bill. I said to re-introduce the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I may point out that there are to be considerable modifications in this Bill. There is the one point of considerable importance upon which the discussion has most frequently turned—the exclusion of the Irish Members and the Irish Peers from this Parliament. We are told that modifications are going to be made in the two clauses which are directly concerned with the question, and we are told that other modifications may be necessary in other clauses of the Bill. In our opinion—though, perhaps, not in that of the Government—very frequently expressed, such alteration as my right hon. Friend intends to make in this respect, when it comes to be examined in detail, will be found to render alterations in almost every clause necessary. At all events, according to the arrangements of the right hon. Gentleman, there are to be modifications of the Bill introduced in the autumn; it will not be the same Bill as this Bill. If it were the same Bill it would not affect the point I put before the House. It would be a new Bill which the House would be able to deal with on the first and second reading; whereas, if we are to proceed with the consideration of this Bill, the only stages when we shall have it in our power will be the Committee, Report, and third reading. I say that the House has a right to know—

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: You do know.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend says we do know. Then, all that is required is for some Member of the Government to get up and state what it is that we do know. The House has a right to know which of the two courses is to be adopted. [Mr. GLADSTONE here said something to the noble Marquess.] My right hon. Friend says that he did say it. I did not understand him to make any announcement that it was intended to adjourn the House after the second reading of the Bill, or to prorogue—

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We cannot prorogue; the Queen prorogues.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is inconvenient to address the House and carry on a conversation as well. I am well aware that we cannot prorogue the House; but my right hon. Friend is not debarred from stating what is the advice the Government was prepared to give to the Queen.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg my noble Friend's pardon. That is exactly what I did say. I beg leave to repeat that I did say that that was the advice which the Government would tender to the Queen. [Cries of "What advice?"] To take the course of Prorogation.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I stated the same thing in answer to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). Before he made the Motion I stated that the proper course would be Prorogation; but that there were certain references which must be made elsewhere—I presumed he must know what that meant—before we could with propriety make an announcement to the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think the last two statements made to the House show more than ever that the Motion for the Adjournment was not uncalled for, because I know now for the first time, and, I believe, the great majority of the House now know for the first time, that it is the intention of the Government—the present intention of the Government—to advise, not the Adjournment of the House, but the Prorogation after the second reading of this Bill. That raises a very important question which it seems to me the House would do very well to take a little time to consider before it goes to the second reading. The House is now going to be asked—after the statement of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer—to do that which I believe it never was asked to do before, and certainly, I may assert, never was asked to do before in the case of a Bill of any miportance. It is going to be asked to give its assent to the second reading of a Bill, which Bill it knows it is not the intention of the Government to prosecute in the present Session of Parliament. Well, now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman states what he and his Friends believe to be the principles to which hon. Members will commit themselves in voting for the second reading of the Bill. I venture to assert that it is beyond the power of the right hon. Gentleman to define for any hon. Member of this House what he will commit himself to, or will not commit himself to, in voting for the second reading. Every Member of this House will be the best judge for himself. Under ordinary circumstances, in voting for the second reading of the Bill, he knows that he is helping it forward in its main and most important stage. He knows that it is open to him to make such observations and to propose such alterations as he desires to make in Committee, and to vote against the Bill on the third reading. But what he is going to be asked to do now is to vote for the second reading of a Bill which he knows cannot, under any conceivable circumstances, be passed into law. What he will be voting upon, in my opinion, is not upon the principle of any measure, such as that defined by the right hon. Gentleman; but he will vote simply upon the question whether he desires to force the Government to dissolve Parliament or not. I venture to think my right hon. Friend, after all his Parliamentary experience, cannot produce any precedent for asking Parliament to proceed to a second reading of a Bill which is dead. And I must say it is a matter for the consideration of the House whether, when it is asked to continue solemnly to proceed with the discussion on the second reading of a measure such as this, it ought to give some attention to the extraordinary, and, as I believe, unprecedented position in which it is being placed. There is another point which it might be for the convenience of the House to consider for a moment, and endeavour to obtain some information. Nothing, or very little, has been heard about another measure which is before the House. Little has been heard of late about the Irish Land Purchase Bill. My right hon. Friend, in answer to a Question yesterday, referred an hon. Member to several passages in a speech which he delivered on the introduction of that measure.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I rise to Order, Mr. Speaker. You are aware, Sir, that the House has been asked to adjourn for the discussion of a definite matter of urgent public importance—the declarations of the Government on the Government of Ireland Bill. I wish to ask, whether the noble Marquess can discuss another measure which is entirely outside of that, and if it is not out of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: Undoubtedly the terms of the Motion handed to me by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) were to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the statement made by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Government of Ireland Bill. Anything but a mere casual reference to any other Bill would be entirely out of Order.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I had not the slightest intention of discussing the Land Purchase Bill. The House will remember that my right hon. Friend in his first speech on the Government of Ireland Bill referred to two questions which, he said, in the view of the Government were inseparable—that is, the Irish Land Bill and the Irish Government measure—and that the only reason why he regretted they could not be dealt with in the same Bill was the enormous mass of material. I think we are entitled to ask whether, in the opinion of the Government, these questions are still inseparable? My right hon. Friend said yesterday that the position arrived at by the Government was simply this—to establish by vote on the second reading the principle of the Government of Ireland Bill; and I want to know whether my right hon. Friend adheres to his intention to ask the House not only to establish by this vote the principle of the Irish Government Bill, but also whether, before he advises the Prorogation, he intends to ask the House to affirm the principle of the Land Bill, which he told us was inseparably connected with this Bill?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to Order, Sir. I wish to ask whether the noble Marquess is in Order in asking, and whether the Prime Minister would be in Order in answering, a question with regard to the intentions of the Government on the Land Purchase Bill on a Motion for the Adjournment definitely confined to the question of the Government of Ireland Bill?

MR. SPEAKER: If I had thought the noble Marquess had been out of Order in the course he has hitherto taken I should have interfered and called his attention to the matter.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I can assure the hon. Member that I have finished all I have to say. It will be for the consideration of the Prime Minister whether he will take this opportunity, or another which he may think more suitable, of giving information to the House on this subject, and which I am sure he will be anxious to give at the earliest opportunity. I do not think I need trouble the House any longer. My right hon. Friend has stated in the course of his speech that the declaration of the Government upon the Government of Ireland Bill has been found to be sufficiently definite to secure for that Bill the determined opposition not only of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but of a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. Well, Sir, it is not the declarations of the Government which have been found sufficiently definite, but it has been the Bill itself with which, up to this moment, we have had to deal. What we do question, and what seems to us a very important consideration now, is whether there is really going to be a definite issue raised upon which the House can decide. The Bill is about practically to be withdrawn from the cognizance of the House, and we are going to be asked to vote for the second reading of a Bill which we now know can never proceed to any further stage. The right hon. Gentleman has laid down something which he says will be affirmed by hon. Members who support the second reading of the Bill. But that is where we say the indefiniteness arises; that is what we say is an attempt to substitute in the place of a Bill, which hitherto we have had to deal with, something more indefinite than any abstract Resolution which has ever been brought before the House. I say that the House will be placed in a position of extreme difficulty and extreme embarrassment—and one in which I do not know any Government previous to this occasion has ever placed the House of Commons in—if it is asked to substitute for a definite vote on a definite issue, such as the second reading of a Bill, a vote on a declaration so vague and indefinite as that which is now practically before the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): We on these Benches are not at all surprised that any action taken by the Tory Leader in this House in connection with the Government of Ireland Bill should have the hearty support and sympathy of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington). In fact, the scene we have witnessed to-night will not fail to be productive of instruction. The noble Marquess says the Bill is dead. The action of the noble Marquess and the action of the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) is the strongest proof that the Bill is far too much alive for them. Some of us may have had some doubts with regard to the tactical course adopted by the Prime Minister; but any doubt we may have had on a question of tactics must be, to a large extent, removed by the extraordinary ebullition of chagrin and disappointment which has been displayed by the noble Marquess and the Tory Party. We are asked to vote on the second reading of the Bill. The noble Marquess says that this is asking the House to adopt a course which is entirely unprecedented, and he wants to know what we are voting upon. The Prime Minister does not want, as I understand it, to base the second reading of the Bill on any purely tactical or technical purpose. But the House is asked to deal with the question of social order in Ireland, and to deal with it by voting the second reading of the Bill, promising to the people of Ireland self-government in their own affairs; and by voting for the principle of that Bill to send to the people of Ireland a message of peace and of love. The Prime Minister said that the state of social order in Ireland was exactly the same as when the late Government dropped the Coercion Act. With great respect, I venture to differ from the right hon. Gentleman. The state of social order in Ireland is in a much improved condition. The state of feeling is much improved; and, Sir, the state of feeling in England is much improved. I will tell you what the House will do when it votes for the second reading of the Bill;

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

it will obey the mandate of the democracy of England, speaking through Representatives with a unanimous voice. Did the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale receive a vote of confidence from his own constituency? Did any of the mutineers against the Prime Minister? [An hon. MEMBER: Yes.] Well, there may have been one or two; but then exceptions prove the rule. Did a single Representative of the masses of the people on that side of the House oppose the Government of Ireland Bill? Did the Labour Representatives, who speak with a special mandate from the toilers of England, rise and say a word of opposition against the Bill? [Mr. ASCH: Not one.] The Labour Representatives in the Liberal Party are unanimous in the support they give to the Bill; and, therefore, I am entitled to say that in voting for the second reading of the Bill the Liberal Representatives of England would obey the mandate of the British democracy, and give to the people of Ireland a message from the masses of the English people of peace and reconciliation between the two nations. That is the question we are going to decide by the second reading of the Bill. We may be prevented from doing so owing to this unholy alliance. The Whigs and the Tories—I will not mention any other—Party, although the House is aware that there is a Party from whom we have, perhaps, a better right to ask for information than from the Prime Minister representing the dominant classes in this country, who are desirous of maintaining the domination of the dominant classes in Ireland. [Mr. HEALY: The Devonshire estates.] The noble Marquess said that the declaration which came from the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a sufficient justification of the Motion for Adjournment. The declaration of the Prime Minister, given in the form of an interruption, was that the Government thought that the better course was to re-introduce the Bill with modifications in the autumn. But the right hon. Gentleman made that declaration before the Adjournment was moved. The right hon. Gentleman was asked by the Leader of the Opposition what course the Government themselves preferred to take; and the Prime Minister, in language as clear as ever was used in this House, declared that of the two courses which most recommended themselves to the judgment of the Government, that of re-introducing the Bill in an Autumn Session was the most satisfactory. Because the Government, therefore, had given an explicit answer, the noble Marquess thinks that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was justified in moving the Adjournment of the House. The reason for moving the Adjournment was not to get information; the real reason was similar to that of the newly-awakened virtue of the hon. Member for Burnley with regard to Secret Service. It was part of a scheme of persistent, of dishonest, of unscrupulous tactics.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is out of Order in applying the word "dishonest" to an hon. Member. The hon. Member must withdraw that expression "dishonest."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Certainly, Sir; but I think you did not hear what I said. What I did say was not applied to any hon. Member, but applied to the political tactics pursued.

MR. SPEAKER: Dishonest tactics were attributed to an hon. Gentleman of this House, and that is the imputation of an improper motive. It is not a proper thing to accuse any Member of dishonest tactics, and I must call upon the hon. Member to withdraw the expression.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Certainly, Sir; I withdraw the expression without hesitation. I was about to ask what is the object, then, of moving the Adjournment of the House? It was not for the purpose of getting information; all the information had been given before the Adjournment was moved. The real reason was for the purpose of disturbing and distracting the public mind. The right hon. Gentleman had another object in view. He and the noble Marquess feared the re-union of the Liberal Party. That is a perfectly intelligible object on the part of the Tory Leader, because a united Liberal Party is not a sight which can be pleasing to the Tory eye. Every Liberal Member, therefore, who joins in such tactics as these means, so far as he can, to prevent the re-union of the Liberal Party, and to prevent it sending a message of peace to Ireland. That has been the course adopted by the noble Marquess and the right hon. Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen) all through. When I heard these right hon. Gentlemen speaking about the retention of the Irish Members, I thought it was the ardent expression of superabundant faith in the matter. Not at all; the reason why they called so much attention to the question of retaining the Irish Members at Westminster was because they knew that it was one of the few points on which different sections of the Liberal Party disagreed, and because they wanted to widen the chasm between the two sections of the Party in order that they might not become united. The people of England, Scotland, and Ireland outside the House are looking with very eager attention at what this House is doing. If it were only for the purpose of securing social order and peace in Ireland the House would be justified in carrying the second reading of the Bill. But I am sure the Liberal Party mean to do more than this—namely, to give a pledge and guarantee on the great question of leaving a people to select their own form of representative government, and that they are going to bestow on Ireland the right of governing her own affairs on her own soil.

MR. RAIKES (Cambridge University): Though the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) may speak the mind of the Treasury Bench, I doubt whether, upon this question, he speaks the mind of the people of Ireland. There is reason to doubt whether the course proposed to be adopted—that of reading the Bill a second time and then withdrawing it—will be regarded as a message of peace from England to Ireland. I do not know whether that peculiar organ of Irish opinion, United Ireland, is to be regarded as a Ministerial organ; but it says that to read the Bill a second time and then withdraw it would be the most undesirable and fatal course which could be adopted, and that it would be better to defeat the Bill in the Lobby. I venture to think that when the hon. Member for Liverpool talks about a divided Liberal Party he should look at home and try to settle his own differences of opinion with the gentlemen who represent United Ireland. The Prime Minister has told us that this is a question which ought to have been raised, not upon the second reading, but after the second reading. It has already been pointed out by my noble Friend below me (Lord Randolph Churchill) that it was the Prime Minister who raised this question first—not, indeed, in this House, and that is our principal grievance against him—but he did raise it in a manner which challenged the notice of the House at a meeting—not a public meeting, but at a meeting which is inaccurately described as a Party meeting—a meeting held at the Foreign Office, to which were admitted only Gentlemen who belong to one section of the Party, which was attended only by one-third of the Members of this House, and at which statements were made which it has been sedulously sought to conceal from two-thirds of the Members of the House so far as regards any utterance from the Treasury Bench. I cannot but think that the course taken by my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) in moving the Adjournment of the House has been amply justified by the incidents which have arisen in the course of the debate. The noble Lord opposite succeeded in making plain that which was previously clear only to the inner consciences of Ministers, and not to any Members on this side of the House—namely, what are the intentions of the Government with regard to this measure. We now learn—we have it on the authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, reinforced by that of the First Lord of the Treasury—that it is the intention of the Government to withdraw the Bill after it is read a second time, to prorogue Parliament, and to introduce another Bill in the course of the autumn. That is precisely the point as to which we sought information. When the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) speaks of reconstruction as applied only to Clause 24, and contrasts that with the reconstruction of the whole measure, he is exactly in the same position as if it had been proposed to withdraw the Franchise Bill and to reconstruct and remodel Clause 3, which was that giving the extension of the franchise. If anybody in a less distinguished position than the Prime Minister put forward the argument he attempted to hold it would be received with universal ridicule. If you reconstruct Clause 24 you transform the Bill. If the House is asked to vote for the Bill in order that it may be withdrawn, it is not even asked to affirm an abstract Resolution; it is asked to go through an idle form simply and solely intended as an expression of unwillingness to reject a measure introduced by the Leader of the House.

LOAN JOHN MANNERS (Leicestershire, E.): As the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has spoken with extreme confidence as to the meaning of Her Majesty's Government in the answer they gave to my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), I wonder whether there is any understanding between Her Majesty's Government and the hon. Member for Liverpool. I do not know whether there is any subterranean means of communication between him and the Government Bench. I do not know what it is to the hon. Member for Liverpool; but I can safely say this—that to the great body of the House the answer of the Prime Minister is enigmatical and unintelligible to the last degree. It was for that reason that my right hon. Friend proceeded to make the Motion for the Adjournment of the House, and I congratulate him upon the success of that Motion, because, undoubtedly, not to him, but to the noble Marquess who sits behind the Prime Minister (the Marquess of Hartington), two Cabinet Ministers vouchsafed the information which they had, in the first instance, denied to the House. Now, we know what advice Her Majesty's Government intend to offer to Her Majesty on this important subject. We know it now, and we know it for the first time; but when my right hon. Friend was driven to make this Motion in order to extract that information, he naturally availed himself of the opportunity to offer a distinct protest against the general course which the right hon. Gentleman announced to his followers at the Foreign Office. But we shall have, no doubt, on the resumed debate on the second reading an opportunity of expressing our views on that part of the subject. My right hon. Friend having now gained the information which he sought for, there can be no object in continuing the debate on the Motion he has made, and he would not put the House to the trouble of an unnecessary division.

Question put.

The House divided:—Aye 1; Noes 405: Majority 404.—Div. List, No. 110.)

VOL. CCCVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

The following is the entry in the Votes:—

Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Member for the Western Division of Bristol, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., the statements of Her Majesty's Government as to the future proceedings on the Government of Ireland Bill; but, the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported that Motion to rise in their places, and, not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen in their places:—

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn:"—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)—The House divided: Aye 1, Noes 405.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

[SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [10th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. RIGBY (Cambridgeshire, Wisbech) said, that the attitude of the opponents of the Bill was now somewhat singular. For a long time they had nothing except complaints from the Tory Members that the measure was so great in extent, and involved topics so new, that time must be given for the purpose of allowing the House and the public adequately to consider the arguments on one side and the other. In those days a great deal of curiosity was expressed as to the opinion of new Members who had not yet taken part in the debate; but of late much of that curiosity had died away, and now the opponents of the Bill

seemed to think that the tide had turned against them, and that they had had enough of the debate. He thought, however, that the time had not yet come for closing the debate, because so many statements hostile to the Bill had been made, and made with a great appearance of authority, that if they were not in some degree met in argument it might be said that no argument could be adduced against them. It was, therefore, with some diffidence, but still in the hope that he might be able to say something that would, at any rate, express the views of those who thought with him, that he had ventured to address the House; but he would promise to confine himself strictly to the legal and Constitutional aspects of the question, because they were connected with the subjects which had been his particular study, and as to which he had been obliged from time to time to formulate opinions, and in some degree to apply them. The points on which he should address his observations referred to such titles as unity of Empire, and supremacy of Parliament. Outside the House the opponents of the Bill had fastened upon those who had supported it epithets which they, no doubt, thought would have some effect upon public opinion. The supporters of the Bill had been called Disruptionists, and non-Unionists. He came forward to say that, as a supporter of the Bill, he was not, at any rate, a Disruptionist, and was no opponent of the Union. On the other hand, he was a firm supporter of the Union, and certainly a firm supporter of the unity of the Empire everywhere. They heard a great deal about a rival Parliament being established in Ireland. The only Constitutional Body in this country that could be called a Parliament was the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. There was but one Parliament throughout Her Majesty's Dominions. A Congress could be constructed by a paper Constitution; Legislative Bodies of different kinds might be made by means of a delegated authority derived from Parliament; but a Parliament such as they knew it in this country could not be created by any paper Constitution, and it did not derive its authority from any superior Body, but by virtue of its own intrinsic power, and it had through centuries absorbed into itself all power and authority in the country, and now stood in a position altogether different from that of any other Legislative Assembly in the world. It was absolutely without control from any other authority without. It was controlled only by the feelings of justice and moderation that actuated the different Members of the different branches of the Legislature. That Parliament was supreme not only throughout the United Kingdom, but throughout all the Colonies and Dependencies of Her Majesty's Dominions; and it was equally supreme in those Colonies which had received a legislative form of Constitution by delegation by Parliament as it was in those Colonies which had not yet received any such Constitution. It would be equally supreme the day after this Bill had passed into an Act, and when the Legislative Body which was to be formed in Dublin was carrying on the functions delegated by Parliament as it was now. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) preferred a movement in the direction of federation, somewhat on the lines of the American Constitution. He would not argue now how far that was desirable; but he was certain that if any such measure was to be adopted now or at any future time, those who supported it must cease to speak of being supporters of the Union of the Empire in the sense in which it was now bound together in unity, and, above all things, they must cease to speak of being supporters of the principle of the supremacy of Parliament. Whatever else they did, if they approximated at all to the lines of the American Constitution, if they adopted any form of federation yet devised, they must have the elements out of which a federation was to be formed, and those elements necessarily must be independent States. How they could have federation or anything that had a resemblance to the Constitution of the United States without, in the first instance, dissolving the Empire and sacrificing altogether the supremacy of Parliament he, for one, was unable to say. He did not see why they should not look forward to the development of our Constitution, and at some future day invite Representatives of Her Majesty's Dominions not represented in that House to seats within those walls; but he trusted that when that day came this would be brought about, not by surrendering any of the powers of Parliament, not by altering the nature of Parliament, or by creating anything that might be co-ordinate with or superior to Parliament, but, if need be, by introducing Representatives to Parliament who would succeed to all the traditions of the history of that Body, and who would have all the privileges which Parliament had received through all the centuries of its existence. He entirely concurred in the principles that had been laid down by the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James), whose great authority upon such a question as this he fully recognized; but he ventured to differ from the right hon. Gentleman as to the application of those principles. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had commenced his speech by quoting a passage from the Prime Minister's speech to the effect that there was no intention on the part of the framers of the Bill to weaken or to impair the supremacy of the British Parliament; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman then went on to read the 3rd section of the Act of Union, which declared that the United Kingdom should be represented by one and the same Parliament, to be called the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and said that as long as that Parliament existed so long would the unity of the United Kingdom be an established fact, and that as soon as it was done away with we should no longer have a United Kingdom. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, went still further, and contended that the unity of the United Kingdom consisted not in the identity of the law, but in the unity of the manufactory of the law. That, of course, meant that we must have one Parliament to manufacture the laws for both countries. But the Attorney General Sir Charles Russell had pointed out with fatal force that such an argument would not hold good for a moment as far as our Colonies were concerned. If our laws must be made in one manufactory, then unity of the Empire no longer existed. But how far did such an argument hold good, even as regarded the United Kingdom itself? In this country we had many manufactories of law other than Parliament. Large manufacturing powers had been conferred upon our municipalities, who were authorized to make laws of great importance for themselves, involving a large amount of taxation. Then, again, the Judges of the land were authorized to legislate upon matters of great importance affecting the administration of justice. These large legislative powers had been conferred upon these numerous subordinate Bodies, because it was believed that such Bodies could legislate better upon the subjects within their jurisdiction than the Imperial Parliament could. But the existence of the powers of such subordinate Bodies was fatal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's contention as to what constituted the Union of the Empire. In his opinion, true unity consisted in the continued identity of the Imperial Parliament, from which the subordinate Bodies received their powers. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had laid down two conditions as necessary for the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament—the first being that that Parliament should be at full liberty to alter its own Constitution and to remodel and to vary that Constitution; and the second being that it should not be subject to the decisions or the decrees of any man or body of men who should have power to say that it had exceeded its jurisdiction. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had rather shrunk from giving any opinion upon what he termed the refinement of the law as to whether a Parliament, such as the Imperial Parliament would be after this Act was passed, would be able to repeal the Act. But when the Imperial Parliament passed an Act there was no authority within its jurisdiction which could dispute the force of such an Act. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that whenever the Imperial Parliament thought fit to pass an Act varying the Irish Government Act every Judge in England and Scotland would be bound to take notice of and to obey such varying Act. No doubt they would be bound by such an Act. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman thereupon proceeded to ask what would be the position of a Judge in Ireland who would say that the Imperial Parliament had given the Irish Parliament authority to make laws, and that as they were passing very good laws he should obey them, notwithstanding any laws which the Imperial Parliament might make. The only opinion which the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave in the matter was that the Irish Judge would be right. The Judge of First Instance sat in Ireland, and he must found his judgment upon the Government of Ireland Act, and any other Act or Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom which might be supposed in some degree to conflict with it. Those were the only materials before him for his judgment. But suppose the decision of the Irish Judge was questioned, then the matter had to come before the supreme tribunal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, composed of Scotch, English, and Irish Judges sitting in England, and they would be bound to obey the Acts of the Imperial Parliament. Therefore, they were brought to this extraordinary conclusion—that two tribunals, having to deal with one and the same question, the one being an inferior tribunal and the other the Court of ultimate appeal—the Judge of First Instance would be right in arriving at a decision which the Court of ultimate appeal would be right in reversing. To arrive at a result so contradictory involved something wrong in the premisses, and that he found to be no other than this—that the Parliament of England had parted with some of its supreme authority to the Irish Parliament, and that from the passing of the Act there were two co-ordinate independent legislative authorities. But they had heard from the Prime Minister when introducing the Bill that the question of an independent Parliament or of a federal arrangement was not to be mentioned; and if there had been any doubt on the point almost the first sentence in the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley), that if the Bill were passed into law it would be within the legal capacity of our Parliament to effect its repeal, would be sufficient to dispel it. He thought the Prime Minister must have introduced the question only to make an eloquent appeal to the Irish Members not to be beguiled by the offer of a Parliament so unlike what a Parliament ought to be. The terms laid before the Irish Members were plain. The Prime Minister said that the paramount object was that the Irish people should be left to manage affairs which were Irish; that in times past some had looked for separation, at least some in the Greater Ireland beyond the seas, but he did not offer them anything of the kind; that he had tried to find out what made the cry for separation possible; that not separation but the closest possible union was required; that he had probed the matter to the bottom, and that he found not separatist tendencies but the demands of the Irish people for local self-government, and that he offered to them freely. We did not disguise that we were keeping over Ireland the same dominion as ever; we only pointed out that the Irish might depend upon it that in ordinary circumstances the independence of the Irish Legislative Body would never be interfered with. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay), in a speech which attracted the attention of the House, followed, to some extent, the line of argument of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury. He observed that it was said that, as a matter of strict law, there might still remain a power in Parliament to repeal or alter this Act, even without the attendance of the Irish Members, but that he doubted that very much. The hon. and learned Gentleman was not prepared to express an opinion more confident than the hint of a doubt. The question was, what would be the state of the law after this Act was passed? Parliament would not be called upon to interpret it, unless, perhaps, by a Declaratory Act, though they might be called upon to amend or repeal it if a repeal was forced upon them. The hon. and learned Gentleman was bold enough to say that the omission from this Act of the clause inserted in the Colonial and Indian Acts reserving all the authority of Parliament led him to the irresistible conclusion that the jurisdiction and powers of Parliament had been weakened and infringed. But the fact was that this clause, which might sometimes be inserted, was always understood, and thus this argument of his hon. and learned Friend had no weight whatever. He listened with a very great deal of pleasure and instruction to the speech of the hon. Member for the Romford Division of Essex (Mr. Westlake), who had contended that we should have no authority in Ireland to carry out the wishes of this Parliament. The hon. Member referred to the original Constitution of the United States, under which it was found that there was no provision for the exercise of any power by the Executive authority. Unquestionably, that was the fact in the first Confederation of the 13 States, each State being independent, and the central Federal Body having no means of enforcing its decrees, and being, in fact, as helpless as this country would be if it attempted to carry out its laws in France or Germany. But that could not happen with regard to Ireland, for in that country the authority of this Parliament was indisputable, and would remain so after the passing of this Bill. In Ireland, if an Executive officer were appointed to carry out that part of the government of Ireland which was reserved to the British Parliament—all matters relating to Customs, Excise, commerce, and navigation being reserved to the Imperial authority—when anything of that sort was required to be done, no Treaty with Ireland was requisite, and the British Parliament could empower persons to carry out its decrees. It would be known that there was a reserve of supreme power in the Imperial Parliament, and that would place us in a totally different position from that which was occupied by the first Federal Government of the United States. He should like to explain why he was one of those who were disposed to support the Bill. He had satisfied himself that this Parliament was not governing Ireland at the present time in any satisfactory sense which they could ascribe to the word “government.” He did not consider that government to be satisfactory which caused among so large a majority of the people a feeling of discontent and hostility towards the governing power. He had satisfied himself that, unfortunately, the feeling of discontent and the desire for greater independence were not likely to pass away from Ireland. The root of that hostility might be in history and in times long ago; but a great deal of discontent existed in Ireland, and he did not see how they could hope to mitigate or to do away with it. So far from their governing Ireland, he felt that in a most intolerable sense of the word Ireland governed England. They found it impossible to carry out legislation for their own country in the presence of a body of Members united in the disposition that the Irish Members had shown for some time past. For that he did not believe in any panacea. No doubt, by the English and Scotch votes they could easily outvote the Irish Members upon every point; but they would be bound to surrender their freedom of action, and they would not be able to separate from their co-gaolers to take any steps independently of them, and in which they might wish to oppose them. He saw no hope of remedying the present state of things except by advancing boldly with the object of removing all sources of Irish discontent. They might think that Irish grievances were exaggerated, but there could be no doubt that the Irish were sincere in the demands they had put forward; and he thought that they should no longer fight against that sentiment, but do their best to carry it into effect.

MR. E. W. BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby): Sir, in approaching the consideration of this Bill we are met with a very remarkable phenomenon. Everyone at the outset must ask himself—“How is it that men whose views on all other questions are wide as the poles asunder, on this are in solid and substantial agreement; and how is it that, regarding it from every conceivable point of mental perspective, they arrive at a conclusion absolutely identical, that conclusion being that at any cost this Bill must be rejected?” The answer is plain—because the principle on which this Bill rests is inadmissible, and the Bill itself, which was to have been a monument to the Prime Minister’s genius, is unworkable. It sweats difficulties at every paragraph, every provision breeds a dilemma, every clause ends in a cul de sac, dangers lurk in every line, mischiefs abound in every sentence, and an air of evil hangs over it all. It is almost unnecessary to argue against this Bill, because it is not recommended by argument. Nor do we know what Bill we are arguing about. In fact, hon. Members are invited to figure for themselves a Bill that will please the fancy, and after agreeing to the second reading of the present measure to imagine that in an Autumn Session a Bill will be brought in which will satisfy all their aspirations. Speeches on behalf of this measure have been delivered in nearly every style of oratory. We have had specimens of the ludicrous, the pathetic, the turgid, the confidential, the denuncia-tory, the light and airy, the tragic and solemn; but all the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken have not provided between them one argument that holds the field. In fact, Ministerial speakers seldom refer to the Bill. They keep at a distance from it, as if it were a dangerous thing to meddle with. They steal shy glances at it over their shoulder, but never do they fairly grapple with it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt), in a speech of nearly two hours' duration, did not dare to touch upon the Bill, and he is bold enough when there is no dynamite about. This last new creation of the Prime Minister's brain, this abortive, monstrous leviathan of legislation, is pierced and riddled through with hostile arguments, and wallows helplessly in the mire, rolling about its huge, ungainly bulk in a vain attempt to get upon its legs. But these spasmodic struggles are its last, and before many days are over it will have given up the ghost. Upon another ground it is unnecessary to produce reasons against this Bill. Reasons can only be addressed to reasonable people; they appeal only to the intelligent; and a high authority has confessed that the reasonable and intelligent part of the nation is against this Bill. I am glad that the claims of the Tory Party, so long ignored, are at last acknowledged. We have been designated as the stupid Party; but now it seems we are the intelligent Party, and so magnanimous are we that we rejoice that we can share this honourable title with many of those who have hitherto denied its justice. But does it satisfy those Members on the other side of the House, who consider themselves the salt of the earth, to be numbered with the ignorant and the foolish, the blind and the prejudiced? Surely, Sir, these lights set on a hill, these minor prophets in their own estimation, who call all men to run unto them, cannot be very well pleased to be classed in such a category. It is a strange occurrence, and one significant of the time, when such a man as the Prime Minister says—"Darkness be thou my light; folly be thou my friend and stay; ignorance be thou my guide and counsellor." Most Ministers are satisfied if their measures have to encounter only the regular opposition to which all Ministerial measures are exposed. But such a course would be too tame and unexciting for the Prime Minister, who has accordingly ranged against himself hostile forces of an unusual and formidable character. In the first place, he has to meet himself in arms, he has to argue against himself or confute himself, to explain away himself, and smash, pulverize, and demolish himself in the most thorough-going fashion before he deals with anyone else. I am afraid he will find himself rather an awkward customer to tackle. Having got rid of himself, he has next to cope with the opposition of, at least, a third of those who sit on his own side of the House, and the strength of this third is not to be measured by mere numbers, inasmuch as it contains nearly all the intelligence, honesty, and backbone of the Liberal Party. The Prime Minister and his followers have very much the appearance of a tadpole—the right hon. Gentleman being the head, and they the little insignificant, invertebrate, wriggling tail. The Prime Minister stands alone on this question, for the support of the Home Rule Party can hardly be said to be impartial, and the support of the Home Rulers was not, in Liberal estimation at the last Election, a passport to popular favour. It is, indeed, a sorry spectacle to see those very same politicians who raged so furiously against the Tories for their supposed alliance with the Parnellite Party now rubbing noses with that Party, and marching arm in arm with them to the dismemberment of the Empire. Such a flagrant exhibition of political immorality has not been seen since the ill-omened coalition of North and Fox more than a century ago, and it is quite enough to debauch the people of England for more than a century to come. Consistency will soon cease to be regarded as a virtue at all. The Liberals have been invited by the Prime Minister to sit down to a banquet of their own election speeches and addresses; but their digestive organs not having yet acquired an assimilative capacity of equal strength and vigour with his, some flatly refuse to come, some munch their own words with manifest repugnance, and some gulp them down wholesale, and try to look as if they liked them. The truth is that the bulk of the Liberal Party in this House do not follow their own judgment, their own convictions, or their own inclinations on this question. They are traitors to themselves. They are bound at the chariot wheels of the Prime Minister. Their devotion is magnificent, but it is not patriotism. It is hero worship run mad. Imagine an impossibility. Suppose the Conservatives had introduced this Bill. The whole Liberal Party, with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of them, would have exploded with indignation. The country would have rung with their denunciations. Fierce, fiery orators would have rushed to and fro like comets, scattering behind them a tail of burning words. Platforms would have sprung up like mushrooms; processions, with drums beating and flags flying, would have paraded our streets, monster demonstrations and cheap trips would have been got up at so much a head, and all the machinery of agitation would have been brought into play. And the Liberals would have been in earnest. Their indignation would have been honest, for I believe they dislike Home Rule, and I venture to say that in their heart of hearts they would like to change places with the Conservatives, and would have been infinitely happier if we had brought in this Bill, and it had fallen to their lot to throw it out. It has been laid down that the duty incumbent on any one Minister or Member who brings in a Bill is first of all to prove the existence of an evil, next to suggest a remedy, and, lastly, to prove that his remedy would cure the evil. Of these three things the Prime Minister has only done one—he has suggested a remedy; but for what? What is the precise and particular evil this Bill is designed to cure? We do not know, for neither he nor anyone else has told us. Is it agrarian? Is it political? Is it sentimental? To say chronic discontent is the evil from which Ireland suffers is to substitute the effect for the cause, and as to the cause we are left entirely in the dark; and, without good cause shown, we should be madmen to pass this Bill. The House must be well aware that this measure is dependent entirely upon the influence of the Prime Minister. Its life is bound up with his life. The cause of Home Rule stands or falls with him, and were his support withdrawn it would collapse completely. No Bill at all resembling this would have the slightest chance of being accepted by Parliament or the country if introduced by anyone else. The demand for a separate Legislature would die a natural death, and it could not be revived. The people would marvel by what witchcraft so many of them were induced to take temporary leave of their senses, and would feel proportionate gratitude to those who, in spite of threats and obloquy, had saved them from themselves. Is there any precedent in our Parliamentary history of a measure of this magnitude being passed at the dictation of one man, which, if that man were removed from public life, would be scouted, mocked at, derided, and kicked into the kennel? Is there any justification for passing such a measure? Were all the great measures of the century so passed? Were the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities, the three extensions of the franchise, and the repeal of the Corn Laws so passed? These measures had all taken hold of the heart and mind of the country. The country insisted that they should pass, and if whole Cabinets had gone down into the pit they would still have been passed. But this measure, more important than them all, is imposed on the country as by an Edict from an Eastern despot; and I hope that the presence of a despot has not so far corrupted the free spirit of the people as to lead them to sanction legislation which, in his absence, they would most certainly condemn. This assertion is not mere conjecture. We have sure and certain evidence of its truth. Last December, in a moment of convivial confidence, the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. H. J. Gladstone) dropped a hint of his father's intentions. The Liberal editor, who was the recipient of his confidence, was so horrified that his bosom could not contain the dread secret. On December 17 it became public property by appearing in the columns of The Standard. All will remember the angry incredulity with which the country, and especially the Liberal Party, received the news. Monstrous, impossible, absurd! they cried with one voice, and denounced it as an infamous Tory fabrication, a malicious invention, without a shred or particle of truth. Indeed, so excited did the Party become that the Prime Minister himself wired from Hawarden disavowing all responsibility for the announcement. Thus were troubled consciences set at rest, and the leading Liberal organ declared that the

 ...would be infinitely worse than it is ...now. In the event of another famine,
 ...for instance, their situation would be
 ...desperate indeed. The Irish Government could not help them, so unless relief came from England—England, hated and maligned, but always ready to assist with her wealth her poorer sister in the day of trouble—they would starve by thousands. This would be only one of the happy results of "Ireland a Nation." Another cry is "Justice to Ireland. That parrot cry was raised in this House on the first reading by the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk

 (Mr. Arch), and I suppose in the forthcoming campaign it will be used again to supply pumped-out politicians with perorations. The hon. Member said that if he went round England and asked every labourer whether he wanted "Justice to Ireland," 90 per cent would say "Yes." Of course they would; but everything depends on how you put a question. If you were to go round England and ask every labourer whether he wanted civil war in Ireland, 90 per cent would say "No." Ten per cent would perhaps say "Yes," as they might be of opinion that a good civil war, in which one half of the Irish nation did their best to exterminate the other half, would be the readiest and quickest way of settling the Irish Question. I would ask the hon. Member if he has ever seen a representation of Justice? I will not refer him to the classics, for though the idea is taken from the ancients, the figure is familiar in modern prints. Justice is always drawn as a tall and stately female, with a pair of scales in one hand and a sword in the other. Hon. Members too often forget the sword. They would substitute for it the gilded bladder tied to a gilded stick which mock Kings carry in pantomimes. Yet the sword is essentially necessary to a true conception of justice. By all means hold the scales level and mete out equal measure to all, showing fear and favour to none; but always remember that without the sword justice is impossible, as the unruly passions of men, unless held in check by a salutary awe, will disturb the true balance and throw it out of gear. Those Gentlemen who call out for justice to Ireland must either get another cry or alter fundamentally their false and shallow conception of justice. Another cry is that Ireland must be governed according to Irish ideas. What are Irish ideas of government? Have they ever been defined? Do they exist at all except as a phrase? Are we sure that government, according to Irish ideas, is not misgovernment according to English ideas? The ideas that lie at the root of a good government are pretty well understood all the world over, and at least as well understood here in England as anywhere else. We have served a long apprenticeship, and should know our trade by this time. We wish to establish in Ireland peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, as much as in England, or in any other country throughout Her Majesty's wide Dominions. But is it pretended, or can it be maintained for a moment, that the principles by which these blessings are to be secured have their dwelling-place in Irish ideas alone? Is there in these ideas a subtle magic—a potent alchemy—that enables them to overcome and transform the essential vulgar characteristics of human nature? Can they make a silk purse out of a sow's ear? If so, how is it that in the speeches of the Irish Leaders this elixir vite has never been detected? If Irish ideas do not clothe themselves in Irish brogue, where are we to look for them? These speeches have run along the whole political gamut, and not a note do they strike, except in this House, that leads us to believe that government by Irish ideas means nothing else than the plunder of the rich by the poor, and the oppression of the weak by the strong. Sir, Ireland is now governed according to Irish ideas; and what do we see? Liberty of speech, liberty of action, liberty of conscience, sore beset and hindered, and almost ceasing to struggle for existence. We see the whole nation, all but the brave North, in the grasp of an iron tyranny that threatens to crush out all healthy life. We have seen that tyranny imposed upon the people by a series of barbaric crimes and brutal outrages, that have excited horror and indignation throughout the civilized world. As a natural result of all this, we see capital leaving the country, business at a standstill, enterprise dead, poverty and wretchedness alone flourishing, a spirit of suspicion and malevolence abroad throughout the land, and a fearful looking forward to the things that are to come; every sign, in fact, that Ireland is in a disturbed, distressed, unwholesome condition. This, Sir, is government according to the law inaugurated by the Land League, and continued, upheld, and strengthened by the National League. The men who have established this illegal system, and who, though not absolutely perpetrators of the execrable deeds by which it is maintained, cannot certainly be acquitted of moral responsibility for them, now demand that we should pass a sponge over the past, and that we should set the seal and sanction of Parliament to an instrument which would be a justification of all their proceedings, and would hand over an integral and important part of the United Kingdom, and with it the lives and properties of thousands of Her Majesty's most loyal subjects, to the government of those who have for years striven to render all good government impossible. We are invited to make the wolf the guardian of the fold. The antecedents of the Parnellites should make it impossible for us to grant their demands; and I maintain that by placing Ireland under the authority of these men we should put a premium upon conspiracy and crime, and should en throne not a Constitutional Government, but a secret society. We should establish not the rule of a Parliament, but the rule of a despot. The Prime Minister is very strong on this point. On May 21, 1882, speaking of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), he said—

"He comes here as the apostle of a creed which is a creed of force, which is a creed of oppression, which is a creed of the destruction of all liberty, and of the erection of a despotism against it, and on its ruins different from every other despotism only in this—that it is more absolutely detached from all law, from all tradition, and from all restraint."—(3 Hansard, [26], 155-1.)

Now, Sir, the hon. Member has not changed his creed. The only change since the day on which those words were spoken is in the number of Apostles who profess that creed. In the last Parliament there were 34; in this there are 86; but the creed remains the same; and, apparently, the only reason why the Prime Minister has become an advocate of this creed of force, oppression, and despotism, is that its Apostles have increased from 34 to 86. This opens out a very serious speculation. At what precise number does oppression become liberty—does despotism become mild and Constitutional government? What is the exact figure at which demands which wore a harsh and forbidding aspect assume such a gracious and beneficent air that we are no longer to repel them sternly, but to embrace them gladly? What numeral has the magic power of transforming things to their contraries—of turning into white what was black, and of making wrong become right? I have only dabbled in moral philosophy, but have never yet come across a system of ethics which was founded on an arithmetical progression. Sir, I deny that the 86 Nationalists who sit in this House are in any true sense Representatives of Ireland. If we look at the numbers alone, they only represent 4,823 more than half the electors of Ireland. Then, Sir, votes should be weighed as well as counted. The South and West—the source and seat of disorder, disaffection, grievance, poverty, and crime—voted for the Nationalists; but the hardy and industrious North—where the trade and commerce and wealth and intelligence of Ireland congregate—is bitterly opposed to the Parnellite programme. Of those who supported it, how many did so from a conscientious conviction, or with any real knowledge of what they were doing? I believe that the number of illiterate voters amounted to one-fourth, and that they voted, almost without exception, for the Nationalists, for to them the Ballot was no protection, and they knew an adverse vote would have exposed them to the terrible vengeance of the National League. The voters in Ireland were acted upon at the last Election by two of the most powerful influences that can control human nature—greed and fear; greed for the property of others, fear for the consequences to themselves. Bribes and threats were dealt out in equal measure. Even religion lent her hand to the agitators. As an inducement they were promised the possession of the land; as a deterrent they were threatened with “Boycotting” in this world and damnation in the next. Can anyone who knows the character of the Irish peasantry be surprised that they voted for the Nationalists, or can anyone so blind himself to notorious facts as to entertain the belief that such a vote was an honest expression of a national conviction? There is no doubt that the Nationalist Party in this House were returned in the main by the Irish peasantry. What is the character of the Irish peasantry? Here is a picture of it drawn by the hon. Member for East Mayo on May 11, 1882, in a speech delivered in this House—

“I know something of the Irish nature and I know something of Irish crime. . . . Who is there that understands, or pretends to understand, the peasantry of Ireland who will say here, without stating a falsehood, that crime and outrage has not the sympathy of the Irish peasantry? I state that because I know it to be a fact.”—(3 Hansard, [269] 488.)

I congratulate hon. Gentlemen on those Benches on the character of their constituents. I think I have said enough to show that the Nationalists are in no true sense Representatives of Ireland, or if they are they represent what is worst in Ireland and ought to be suppressed, not what is best and ought to be encouraged. On behalf of the idle and vicious they come here, not on behalf of the industrious and respectable. They have usurped the name of the Irish nation; but the true Ireland has not spoken, and cannot speak, while she is in the hands of Thugs. The Prime Minister has taken those who make the loudest noise at their own estimation. He has regarded a foul, malignant, and traitorous organization as the mouth-piece of Ireland. Because we refuse to grant Home Rule we are told that we are the enemies of Ireland. The Irish Leaders are the worst enemies of Ireland. They exaggerate every petty grievance such as must exist in every country, in every age, under every Government, into wrongs of the first magnitude, in order that they may win a bubble reputation and fill their own pockets. They fan the embers of discontent that are always smouldering in the Irish character into a glowing flame of passion; they fill the ears of an excitable and credulous people with tales of English cruelty and oppression, mostly false, in order to arouse a passionate and undying hatred to English rule, English order, English law, English manners, and English religion. They never cease to teach and to preach hatred to England; they exalt it into a moral obligation; they draw the minds of the Irish away from their peaceful avocations and daily toil in order to plunge them in the turmoil of politics. They intoxicate their senses with the alcohol of agitation. You say we know nothing of the Irish. What do the Irish know of us? You take care that they do not know the truth, or your occupation would be gone. The idea the ments against the measure. The first serious argument against the Bill was that raised by the noble Marquess the Member for the Rossendale Division, who urged that the House of Commons should not pass the Bill because it had not received a popular mandate to deal with the subject. The doctrine thus propounded by the noble Marquess was, however, an absolutely un-Constitutional doctrine, and had been denounced as such, and as likely to lead to the greatest danger, by no less an authority than Mr. William Pitt. It was the prerogative of Parliament fairly and freely to represent all the Estates of the Realm. The argument of want of mandate from the constituencies was used against the Union with Ireland, against the granting of representation to the Principality of Wales, in the case of the Union with Scotland, and in settling the Succession to the Crown. In all those cases there had been no such thing as a mandate from the constituencies. But had not, in fact, the constituencies given a mandate? It was stated that the Prime Minister had sprung this question on the country. In fact, however, the right hon. Gentleman had in Mid Lothian pointed out that now, for the first time in the history of Ireland, it was open to the people by Constitutional means to declare what their will was as to the government of their country. Nor was that way of regarding the question confined to one side of the House. The noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale had charged the noble Lord the Member for Paddington with trifling with the question of Home Rule, and the noble Lord did not attempt to deny the charge. There was hardly a single Member who did not, in addressing his constituents, refer to this question as one of momentous gravity. It was laid clearly before his own constituents, who declared distinctly and emphatically in favour of Home Rule. He passed on to consider the second material objection. As to the argument against the Bill that the integrity of the Empire had disappeared, in a system like ours, with a number of Colonies, whose tie to the Mother Country was purely one of sentiment, that argument had been abandoned, and it was now clearly understood that the concession of Home Rule to Ireland could not really impair the unity of the Empire. Then it was urged that the Bill was one for the Repeal of the Union. The speech which Lord Clare made in 1802 had been much criticized, and it had been quoted very largely against the Liberal Party and against the Prime Minister. Speaking of what was called the unity of the two Kingdoms, Lord Clare enumerated a certain number of matters which go to constitute legislative independence. He said that all legislative authority in either country was denied to the other, not only in municipal regulations, but in every branch of Imperial policy, whether of trade and navigation, of peace and war, or Revenue, or of Executive Government. The points Lord Clare mentioned to prove that Ireland was separate from England were precisely the points which the Prime Minister had in this Bill reserved for the exclusive control of the Imperial Parliament. He (Mr. Atherley-Jones), therefore, submitted to the House that the Repeal of the Union had gone to the same limbo as the original accusation about the integrity of the Empire. The last foothold of the opponents of the Bill was that the present proposals would impair the supremacy of Parliament. He did not hesitate to say that the arguments addressed to the House by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) and the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay) upon this point, and on which they had descanted at great length, were absolutely fallacious. But if there was one question of Constitutional law more clear and undoubted than another, it was that, unless they absolutely took away or abdicated the whole sovereignty of Queen, Lords, and Commons, the absolute supremacy of Parliament could not be impaired by any Act of Parliament. Mr. Dicey, whose book had been quoted in opposition to the Bill, and who, unfortunately, was himself one of its opponents, had in more than one passage, in the most unqualified language, insisted on this doctrine, and shown that even in the case of Colonies to which the largest powers of self-government had been granted the most absolute power of veto was reserved to the Crown, which was, in effect, the same thing as the Imperial Parliament. He Mr. Atherley-Jones, was not so foolish as to suppose that they did not intend practically to give to the people of Ireland exclusive control over their own affairs; but, although they so intended to do, they did so from moral considerations, founded on the principles of good faith. They gave this power to the Irish people believing that they would use it to the advantage of their race; and they did so in the conviction that if, unhappily, circumstances should arise hereafter that might render it unnecessary for the Imperial Parliament to intervene, in no wise should it be deprived of the full exercise of its power. Before concluding, he desired to say a few words with regard to the position in which he and his Friends stood. There could be no doubt whatever that those hon. Members who sat on the Ministerial side of the House, with a few exceptions, were agreed upon the point that autonomy should be conceded to Ireland. That being so, he asked what were the alternative schemes? What were the proposals which were made by hon. Gentlemen who sat on the opposite Benches, and by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan)? All these hon. Gentlemen had tried their hands at what the scheme should be; but they had all failed most grievously. He was satisfied in his own mind that there was not a Gentleman in the House who did not believe that the measures proposed or suggested by the noble Marquess and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham were totally inadequate to meet the requirements of the Irish people, or in any way to bring this great Irish question to a final close. He was an advanced Liberal, and had always been taught to look up to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham with feelings of the keenest regard and the deepest respect; but there were times when such feelings received a rude shock. His feelings towards the right hon. Gentleman had upon this occasion received a rude shock. The right hon. Gentleman, who would reap the full harvest of democracy in England, would deny the first germ of it to Ireland. The people of England would consider this fact. They asked themselves why it was they now found the right hon. Gentleman deserting, and even reprobating, the Prime Minister? He feared the answer in this case was that the democracy knew no limits beyond the limits of the human race. The right hon. Gentleman condemned the policy and scheme of the Prime Minister, and said he felt it his duty, as an ex-Cabinet Minister, to unfold his scheme. What was the right hon. Gentleman's scheme? He appealed to the consideration of the House for the poor crofter and the agricultural labourer that they should not be allowed to spend their hard earnings in paying taxes to buy out the Irish landlords; but in the very same breath he announced that he would tax the crofter and the labourer in order to set up a gigantic Poor Law Union to relieve the distress of Irish landlords. The right hon. Gentleman said he objected to the scheme because it was tantamount to the Repeal of the Union; but the very next day stated his readiness to go in for federation. One single elector of Birmingham was found sufficiently bold to ask the right hon. Gentleman what he meant by federation; and what did the right hon. Gentleman say in reply? Why, that the system which obtained in the United States of America was the system which most commended itself to him. Now, he (Mr. Atherley-Jones) was of opinion that the amount of power which was vested in each individual State of America was far larger than that which was proposed to be granted to the people of Ireland by this Bill. Besides, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that if they had federation they must have something to federate. For his part, he felt that he should be acting in accordance with the sentiments of the people who had elected him when he said that he was in favour of the Bill, and he should vote for it in that belief in his heart that it would satisfy the just aspirations of the Irish people and conciliate that country to England, so that she would still remain an integral part of the British Empire.

Mr. FISHER (Fulham) said, that they were asked no longer to vote upon this measure, but only upon an abstract Resolution, whereas the whole difficulty of the measure was in its details. They were now told that the Irish Members were to be included and were to sit in that House; but, in his opinion, the inevitable result would be the anarchy and confusion which the Prime Minister had referred to. What was there to prevent some combination being made with the Irish Members who came over to vote in that House whereby the Church in England should be disestablished, while as a quid pro quo they would have to be granted some change in the Constitution given by this Bill by which hon. Members below the Gangway might establish another Church in Ireland? They would be able to enact a measure by which England should have dearer beer in order that Ireland might have cheaper whisky. They were told that the Irish Members were only to sit in that House for special purposes; but the Prime Minister himself had said that it was impossible to separate local and Imperial affairs. Let them take, for instance, the case of a debate on the Budget. Would Irish Members be allowed to vote upon an Amendment to the Budget? Undoubtedly hon. Members below the Gangway would be affected by some Resolution as to the Expenditure upon the Army and Navy and the Services. The Rules of Procedure, again, would affect them, even if they were only admitted once a year. The consequence would be that on a measure of that character the Irish Members would have the fate of the Ministry in their hands; and if that was the case there was an end to all finality in this measure, because everything would become a matter of bargaining with the Irish Members. Apart from that, something else had been overlooked—namely, the enormous voting power which Irishmen possessed in this country. If the Irish Members wanted some concession in the way of an alteration in the Constitution which was now to be imposed upon them, they would be able to traffic with the promise of the Irish vote in this country at the next Election. He did not believe that Ireland would be satisfied by the grant of a separate Legislature of the sort which was now contemplated. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had told them that there was no half-way house between government by the Imperial Parliament at St. Stephen's and complete independence; and, in his opinion, anyone who attempted to build a half-way house would find that he was building it on sand, and that the fall of that house would be great, and would be accompanied by bloodshed and by disaster to this Empire. He knew that many hon. Members opposite believed that this would be a final measure, and that Irishmen would be satisfied by it; but he would ask which Party in that House was most likely to be right upon this point—those who relied on the sayings and speeches of hon. Members below the Gangway, or those who relied upon the assurances, with many reservations and many qualifications, and upon the promises yet unperformed of the hon. Member for Cork? They had the authority on their side of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] From the Prime Minister's speech at Aberdeen, he would have said that the right hon. Gentleman, at that time at all events, was not in favour of granting a separate Legislature to Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) was the only Minister on the Front Bench who had been consistent. But even he had taunted the Conservative Party with advocating a policy of "soft words and hard cash." He would describe the Chief Secretary's policy not as one of "soft words and hard cash," but of soft words and promissory notes, drawn upon other people's property. The Bill, he contended, did not contain the elements of finality. Hon. Members would be reminded of the promises they had made in the past, and would be called upon to fulfil them. The national sentiment in Ireland might be described as not "Three acres and a cow," but "Three acres and a pig." What had they seen in recent years in Ireland? They had seen men like John Mitchel returned to that House. [An Irish MEMBER: He was a noble Ulster man, but he is dead.] Well, he should not refer further to John Mitchel, as he had learned that he had gone to the "bourne from which no traveller returned;" but could they forget that not so long ago Tipperary returned O'Donovan Rossa as Member of Parliament for that county; and he would ask the House to consider what was to prevent him being elected to the Irish Parliament? Was that an argument for handing over power to these men? He could not wonder that the loyal Irishmen in Ulster were aroused and angry. And he should not be surprised if they submitted themselves to many pains and penalties rather than allow themselves and their property to be placed under the control of men of such an infamous character.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: If you refer to Mitchel, he was one of the noblest Irishmen that ever lived.

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

MR. FISHER said, he did not know whether the hon. Member for South Tyrone would apply that to O'Donovan Rossa.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: O'Donovan Rossa is now what you made him. Whatever he was before, he is now what you have made him by your tortures, while he was in your prisons.

MR. FISHER said, that if O'Donovan Rossa was the noblest character—

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I never said so. I said John Mitchel was one of the noblest characters Ireland has produced.

MR. FISHER said, he was extremely glad they had done some good in Ireland. He saw nothing in the Bill to prevent Rossa being Prime Minister of Ireland, and the hon. Member for South Tyrone Speaker of the Irish House of Commons. References had been made to the Conservative policy as one of coercion. He denied that it was so. Coercion was only employed to meet exceptional crime. When he went before his constituents at the General Election, he stated to them that he was prepared to grant a large measure of local self-government to Ireland. He did not woo the Irish voters in his constituency by saying that he would vote for the establishment of a separate Legislature in Dublin. He denied the statement of the hon. Member for North-West Durham (Mr. Atherley-Jones) that this question had been settled at the last Election. His opponent for the constituency which he represented Mr. George Russell was a Member of the late Liberal Administration, and in his Election address that gentleman stated that—"In the interests alike of England and of Ireland, he should oppose the legislative separation of the two countries."

He was under the impression that that gentleman was at that time in the secrets of the Prime Minister; but, at all events, he denied that the question was before the constituencies at the General Election. He maintained that it was not fair on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that coercion was the only alternative which the Conservative Party had to offer. He invited Irishmen still to take some part in the preservation of our great Empire, in the building up of which they had borne a glorious and a conspicuous share—an Empire which administered just and merciful laws, and which never could be maintained in all the fulness of its vigour as the chief factor in the civilization of the world unless it was preserved under one Queen and one Parliament.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND (Somerset, Wellington) said, that he addressed the House not from any desire to make personal explanations, or to vindicate the course which he intended to take with respect to this measure. He did not presume to speak for other hon. Members on his own side of the House; but if the difficulties which he had felt were felt by others, and which he himself had overcome, could be any proof of the sincerity of his convictions, he wished to put his views shortly before the House. Much as he admired the frank and high spirit of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), he could not sympathize with him, or believe that he was justified in the remark which he had made as to the Prime Minister bringing this question forward as a surprise on the country. Knowing as he did from personal friendship, and not from any public or official connection, the frank way in which the Prime Minister expressed his own feelings to those with whom he came in contact, he should, indeed, be surprised if some of the most bitter opponents of the right hon. Gentleman at this moment would get up in the House and say, before they went to their constituents at the Election, that they were not aware of the tendency of his views. What did the right hon. Gentleman himself say at the Election? It would be remembered that on certain burning questions a red flag was hoisted at Birmingham, which was followed by the hoisting of a blue flag at Hatfield. The Prime Minister, however, did not appeal to the electors on any burning question. He called upon them to apply themselves sincerely and earnestly to the primary duties of a deliberative Assembly, and the right hon. Gentleman warned the constituencies and the candidates that if order was to be maintained in Ireland it was necessary to have a strong Liberal Government. So far as he was personally concerned, he certainly spoke on no exciting topic to his constituents. He impressed on them the important fact that three of the greatest Liberal measures passed by Parliament had been passed when the Liberals were put out of Office and their Successors came in. So, in like manner, when the question of Ireland came most prominently to the front it was necessary to have a Liberal Government and not a Conservative Government in power for the purpose of maintaining order in that country. He wished, however, to avoid all Party imputations; but he could not refrain from observing that in the course of the discussion a great deal of vague language and many vague catchwords had been employed—as, for example, “the Empire,” “Imperial interests,” and “Repeal of the Union,”—mixed up with a great many vague sentimental appeals to nationality. He could not bring himself to vote for an abstract Resolution in favour of autonomy in Ireland; he wished to have something in definite and clear language which lawyers might interpret afterwards. He believed that if there was one thing for which the country was anxious it was a united Empire maintained by the supremacy of an Imperial Parliament. The Bill proposed to constitute for Ireland a legislative authority, an executive authority, and a judicial authority. On these points he wished to see not legal theories but practical propositions. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) spoke clearly about the supremacy of this Parliament; but he was not strictly accurate in what he said. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Bill as defining the delegation of a limited portion of the legislative power of this Parliament to the new Body; but the Bill rather defined the power it did not delegate. As the matter stood it was possible that in the future great differences of opinion might arise. The new Body was to be intrusted with matters of Irish concern; but what were they? They involved the protection of life and property, and generally the maintenance of social order, including liberty of contract and the payment of debt. Making allowance for all restrictions, the Legislative Body would be practically independent. It would, for all practical purposes, have legislative independence; and, according to the Attorney General, there would remain in this Imperial Parliament a great reserve of power which was not intended to be used except in some great emergency. The responsibility of this Parliament for the happiness of Irishmen would be in abeyance. Irishmen in Ireland would be absolutely dependent on the sense of responsibility to which he hoped the granting of power might train the Members of the Irish Parliament. Many of the Irish Members of this Parliament were rising to this sense of responsibility; but still we could not forget the vindictive spirit in which some of them had spoken of Earl Spencer and of the Prime Minister, and the opinions of the 85 Members could not be accepted as the last word from the whole of Ireland. Their position might be strong, constitutionally, and many might by Parliamentary service have earned claims to personal respect; but still, before displacing the Executive of Ireland, creating a new system under the control of a Legislative Body, and surrendering the power of the Imperial Parliament, he must look at what was going on in Ireland, and particularly at the “Boycotting” which so largely affected tradesmen, and appeared to be countenanced by high ecclesiastical authority. He should feel more comfortable if he could see Irish Members effectively using their influence to put a stop to this system. What was the remedy proposed? That the Imperial Parliament should abdicate its whole responsibility, and trust to a sense of responsibility arising suddenly as soon as absolute powers over Irish affairs was transferred to an Irish Legislature. He wished to trust the Irish people, and he believed that they might, as a whole, be trusted if their passions were not aroused and their self-interest was not appealed to by those who misled them. But he had to look at that as a practical question of government, and he said that if a measure could not be carried at once for establishing social order in Ireland, he earnestly hoped that Englishmen and Scotchmen might appeal to their Irish fellow-countrymen to show themselves worthy of the trust which we wished to place in them. With regard to the veto—although Mr. Dicey, whose authority had been quoted, had told them very plainly in an article which appeared three months ago, that the Colonial system of veto was utterly inapplicable to the case of England and Ireland, still, for himself, he believed that the Government had framed that Bill with an honest intention that the veto should be a reality; and from what he had heard yesterday, he understood that it would undoubtedly be in the power of Parliament to call the Ministers of the Crown to account if they neglected their duty in Ireland. He felt quite sure that it was not by a union of Parties, or something in the nature of coercion, that we could look forward to the restoration of order in Ireland; but it was to a growing good feeling between the toilers of Great Britain and Ireland that we were to look for a good understanding between the two countries. With regard to alternatives, he admired the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale as a true-hearted Liberal and a fine manly specimen of the English aristocracy; but it seemed to him that the noble Marquess offered them nothing but a simple negative to the carefully-prepared plan of a responsible Government, and he neither indicated any alternative nor even his willingness to undertake the responsibility. Then as to those who aspired to head the Radical Party, he did not understand their policy, nor did he presume to fathom their purposes. For himself, he came to the conclusion that he could not refuse to join in sending a message of sympathy to the Irish people as a whole. He wished to believe and to trust their Representatives. He could not trust the Nationalist Members as a Party, because they had surrendered their freedom of deliberative action; but he thought he might safely rely on some indications of a gradually growing sense of responsibility, and a changed tone of feeling towards this country. He believed, also, that among the English and a large proportion of the Scotch people there was a disposition to meet the Irish in a responsive spirit. He was convinced that a mere recasting of the machinery of local government was quite unsuited to the emergency, and he thought that more good was to be expected from a collective representation of all interests meeting at Dublin and speaking, not in unison, but in that harmony which might result from variety. The Ulster men were sometimes more Irish than other Irishmen; and he did not believe that in their hearts they were so much afraid of what was coming as was sometimes supposed. He was, therefore, in favour of the 1st clause of the Bill. The words of the 2nd clause were wide reaching, but they must be taken with the restrictions and exceptions and with the prerogative of the Crown. He was prepared to face the problem as inevitable of establishing a bona fide Legislative Body in Ireland; but he hoped that the Government would pause before they gave it control over the Judges, and he certainly was not prepared to make it independent of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Reserving in every sense the abiding and continued responsibility of Parliament to promote the happiness of Ireland, he believed that a Legislative Assembly in Dublin was, under all the circumstances, expedient, provided that the extent of its powers was not prejudged. The people of both countries were, in his opinion, anxious to come together and to work in harmony, and he hoped that these debates would result in the promotion of the welfare and the happiness of the people and the maintenance of the honour of the Empire.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S. : Sir, I do not think that the Representative of an Irish constituency can rise to join in this debate without feeling that it is the most momentous discussion in which the Irish Members have taken part since their entrance into this House. Looking back beyond the present century, through the vicissitudes which have marked the connection of England and Ireland, I do not believe that, at any period of that connection, a more fateful issue has been raised between the two nations than that which confronts us to-night. Hon. Members on opposite sides of the House will doubtless form widely different estimates of the policy which Her Majesty's Government is pursuing; but no section of the House will deny that the problem which the Government seeks to solve is of vital import not alone to Ireland, but to the Empire. An opportunity has arisen, under circumstances which I will venture to describe as especially favourable, for the healing of a long-standing feud between the two peoples. In Ireland, it has at length been possible to frame, in a Constitutional manner, the demand of the country for what it considers its rights, and to give a practically unanimous expression to that demand. It has, furthermore, been possible to bring the Irish people to the temper of mind in which they are willing to forget and forgive the wrongs that have been done them—in which they are willing to enter into cordial union with the present generation of Englishmen, leaving the unfortunate past to history and historians. It has been possible to inspire them again with confidence in Parliamentary methods, and to induce them to look to this House for a redress of their grievances. They are waiting, in silent expectation, for the answer of Parliament to the demand they have addressed to it; and I believe it is only the foes of England, or her very short-sighted friends, who could wish them to be disappointed. In England, too, a temper of mind seems to prevail which is favourable to the solution of the Irish difficulty. Among a large section of the English people, the bigoted hatred and irritating contempt of the Irish nation, to which we were so long accustomed, have given place to a better understanding of our claims, and a more generous sympathy with our necessities. There are, too, among responsible English statesmen, some at least who are enlightened enough, and patriotic enough, to seek in their solution of it not the mere triumph of a Party, not the mere gratification of personal ambition or personal spleen, but only the welfare of the peoples whose destinies they are set to control. To such men, and to the unprejudiced Englishmen whom they represent, our claim to self-government must be easily intelligible. Addressed to them by any other people under the sun, it would at once command their sympathy and ensure their support. We base our claims on our natural rights to enjoy the privileges, as we possess the character, of a free nation. We are a people geographically distinct from the English. We have a national spirit of our own. We have our own historical traditions. We have our own peculiar wants, and, in great part, we profess a different religion. This character of a distinct nationality we have ever upheld, as the incidents of a somewhat unfortunate history bear witness. We are now, as we have ever been, fully conscious of our right to national autonomy; and as we have striven to enforce that right in the past, so shall we strive to enforce it now. In asserting that we are a people distinct from the English, I must not be understood to mean that we are by nature antagonistic to England, nor even that we are necessarily opposed to her by tradition. It does not follow that because a man is not English, or of English blood, that he is therefore the enemy of England. We were not born Englishmen, and we will not die Englishmen; but that is no reason why through life we may not co-operate with Englishmen for a common political purpose. In many parts of the world men who are not English by race are nevertheless staunch friends of England. In many portions of the habitable globe men, alien by birth, are politically connected with England, and are fervent supporters of the English connection. There is, therefore, no firm reason why we cannot be at peace with England without being forced to become Englishmen. I wish to insist strongly upon this point—that it may be understood that, in putting forward this claim, in no sense do we meditate an attack upon Great Britain, and in no way do we wish to make our just demands a menace to her greatness. Being, therefore, a people apart, and forming a distinct, though not a separate, nationality, we assert our claim to the privilege of a people, and insist upon our right of national self-government. The claim thus put forward determines at once our attitude regarding all proposals of local self-government. We cannot consent to accept minor measures of parish administration by Elective Boards as a compromise of our demands for a National Legislature. Being a people, we claim a people's right—the government of our nation by our nation. We claim to manage for ourselves in National Council the national concerns which affect us and us only. We can accept nothing less than this. We have a duty to our country's ancient name and to the undying aspirations of our race, and we should fail in our obligations to both if we demanded less. I trust hon. Gentlemen will so far understand our demand as to perceive that no arrangement of County Boards or Provincial Councils will in any way meet it. I trust, too, that we shall not again be asked to explain why Ireland cannot submit to be governed in the same way as the Municipality of London, or the county of Middlesex. It may seem, perhaps, to hon. Members that this aspiration is but a striving after a romantic idea. To that we reply that the ideas which govern men are factors of political life with which practical statesmen must deal. The history of mankind proves that ideas have had much to do in shaping the destinies of nations. I might add that ideas of this kind, when entertained by other nationalities, have found ample sympathy and encouragement from English statesmen, and that, thus fostered, they have not unfrequently revealed themselves as forces of vast power in the history of the modern world. Let English statesmen then realize, once for all, this plain truth—that the Irish people are determined at all cost to be a free people. We do not object to form a portion of the Empire; but we protest that we must be a free portion of it, requiring that we shall be recognized as a nation within the Empire. We demand that we be permitted to enjoy within the Empire the legislative and administrative independence which befits a free people. We cannot consent to have our laws made by an Assembly which is the Representative Body of another people, which does not live with our political life, which is not vitally concerned in our national prosperity, and which therefore cannot legislate in our name. Allowing such an Assembly to be actuated by a desire to accord us the fullest and most ample justice, the fact of its being virtually a foreign Assembly would still make its legislation a yoke, and at best a well-meant oppression. Again, we cannot submit to have our Administration placed in the hands of strangers, who are ignorant of the condition of our people, who are unable to sympathize with their feelings and aspirations, and whose government in consequence does not represent the national will. Granting that they were animated by the most honourable motives, the fact of their being strangers makes their interference in our domestic concerns a grievance, to which force alone will oblige us to submit. So long as the Senate in which our laws are made shows a majority of five to one against the Representatives of our people, so long will this grievance subsist; and, furthermore, so long as the control of the Irish Administration rests with a Parliament so constituted, so long must we hold with the distinguished Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that the Government of Ireland is an alien bureaucracy. I would again beg the House to understand that when I say "strangers," I do not mean enemies. I would convey that our laws are made and administered by men of different race, of different nationality, with but very imperfect opportunities of becoming acquainted with our circumstances and our wants, and whose political education has not fitted them to sympathize with either. You may still govern the ryots of India through English gentlemen appointed by the authorities at home; but in Ireland the point has been reached in political education, and I trust in political power, when this system is no longer feasible. The time I hope has arrived when the Rulers of Ireland shall be appointed by the will of the Irish people and not by a Government which comes and goes by the will of the people of England. Giving credit to Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen, for a sincere desire to rule Ireland aright, we still hold that they ought not to rule her because they are not of her people, and we emphatically decline to submit to their government. Is there anything preposterous in that? I appeal to the fairness and common sense of this House, and of the English people—Would the people of England consent to have their laws made by a Legislature sitting in Washington or Sydney, were those cities within four hours' sail of London? Would they submit to have their Administration placed in the hands of the American or Australian nominees of such an Assembly? We know full well their national spirit would revolt against such an arrangement. Why, then, should the Irish people acquiesce in a state of things under which their laws are framed by a Senate established in London, and the administration of their affairs is placed in the hands of individuals appointed by such a Parliament? But, Sir, the legislative independence of Ireland is not merely an idea—independence is something more than a mere ornament of a people's life—it vitally concerns the material interests of the nation, and affects profoundly its general welfare.

I do not know if the history of the human race furnishes one example of a country which has prospered without being free. If it does so, I have not heard of the example, nor read of it. It will, I think, be found that an alien domination, established in the midst of a people, has ever formed a centre from which deadly influences radiated to blight and blast the national prosperity and paralyze the national life. That, I believe, has been the rule in other nations. It certainly has been the rule in Ireland. The era of our Parliamentary independence was the one era of prosperity amongst us. With the destruction of our Independent Legislature began a period of decay which, continuing without interruption, has eventuated in the condition in which we find ourselves now. During the years immediately preceding the Union Ireland was a thriving nation. She possessed a widespread and ever-increasing trade. The ferment of industrial life was active throughout the country, the bustle of commercial enterprise enlivened the streets of our towns; numerous native manufactures afforded occupation to our people, and swelled the sum of the nation's resources. The City of Dublin, which was then worthy of the name and dignity of the Metropolis of Ireland, was among the most brilliant and most wealthy of the European capitals. Sir, the statements of Lord Clare and of Lord Plunket as to the pre-Union prosperity of Ireland have been given to the House during the course of this debate. I shall now ask the attention of hon. Members to some other statements to the same effect—statements of the traders and bankers of Dublin in 1798 and 1799—and that Parliament, be it remembered, was representative only of a section of the nation—it represented the Protestants of Ireland only. Yet under the rule of that Assembly, thus imperfectly constituted, the progress of Ireland was rapid beyond example—so rapid, that jealousy has been assigned as the motive which prompted English Ministers to destroy the liberties to which that prosperity was attributed. I will not dwell upon the means to which Ministers stooped to effect their disastrous purposes. I believe there is not now an instructed Englishman who does not look with shame upon the devices by which the Legislative Union was effected. I believe that there are few amongst those who advocate the continuance of the Union who, if it had to be effected again, would not shrink from participation in the loathsome horrors by which it was accomplished. Hon. Members, who are strangers to the methods of government that have hitherto obtained in Ireland, may think this language exaggerated. Were they natives of an Irish county, through which the ancient Britons and their mercenary German allies had been encouraged to carry ruin and dishonour and death, and where every glen has been the scene of some fiendish outrage, perpetrated by public authority on a defenceless peasantry; had they spoken with men who were eye-witnesses of the ghastly infamies done in the name of the British Government to force a wretched people into rebellion, they would not esteem any language of indignation and abhorrence too strong for the crimes denounced. But I do not wish to keep the attention of the House fixed further on these melancholy events. I trust we are about to enter on an era of good feeling between the people of the two countries, in which the remembrance of these wrongs may be suffered to die out. What I am concerned to bring under the notice of the House is the circumstance that the Union has been disastrous to that prosperity in which, under a free Parliament, Ireland had advanced so rapidly. I shall be brief in my reference to the significant statistics which prove the dismal truth—statistics as to Irish manufactures. It appears, then, that the commercial and manufacturing prosperity of Ireland did not long survive the Legislature to which it owed its existence—a period of gradual decline began with the advent of the foreign Government which has lasted to our own day, and which has now reached its lowest point, because there is nothing left for it to destroy. An attempt was made some time since, in an Address presented to the new Viceroy by the Dublin Chamber of Commerce, to prove, from the Returns for the Port of Dublin, that the trade of Ireland had increased during the past 80 years. The tonnage of the vessels that entered and leave the port is much greater than it was at the beginning of the century—therefore, argued these discerning merchants, the prosperity of Ireland has increased. The Returns of the Port of Dublin seem to furnish the most melancholy evidence of the decadence of Ireland that could well be offered us. It will be found, on examination of these Returns, that the bulk of the imports to Ireland come in the form of manufactured goods, and that the exports are mainly agricultural products. The fact that, since 1800, Ireland has been driven to buy more largely manufactured articles, and to pay for them in agricultural produce, is proof that her own industries have died out. Instead of utilizing her agricultural produce in maintaining a native manufacturing population, and exporting only as much of her surplus produce as would pay for the raw material, she has now to export as much as pays not only for the raw material, but for the labour which, 80 years ago, was supplied by a thriving population at home. The barristers and half-pay officers who form the Dublin Chamber of Commerce can hardly be regarded as authorities upon matters commercial; but their fallacies are worthy of notice, since they have been taken as a test by more thoughtful men. The one industry which, since the unfortunate Act of Union, has thriven in Ireland—apart from landlordism—is that of cattle raising. But that increase is no indication of national prosperity—it is rather the reverse. It indicates that a large part of the population has been exterminated to make way for cattle; that a readier means has been found of paying foreign countries for the commodities that were before manufactured at home, and a simpler method introduced of raising the yearly revenue which the people of Ireland have had to furnish to the 1,500 absentee landlords, who claim an exorbitant rent for some 4,500,000 Irish acres, of which they assert themselves owners. I will not weary the House by quoting further statistics in proof of the melancholy effects of the Legislative Union on Irish industries and Irish trade. I could wish that hon. Members who have no experience of our country could pay a visit to Dublin or any other of the Irish towns that, 80 years ago, were thriving centres of commercial and industrial life. It would do more to convince them than volumes of statistics. They should see the ruin which is gradually settling down upon those towns, the half-empty streets, the lines of noble houses crumbling into decay, the aqualor and misery which are invading the quarters in which wealth and rank had their home; and I venture to predict that, after an experience of this kind, they will not be deeply impressed by the figures of the Dublin Chamber of Commerce. But the loss of our industries and our commerce is not the only material disaster which we owe to the Legislative Union. We had a right to expect that the new Legislature, which usurped the functions of our own, would give attention to the one industry which was left to us, only because we could not be deprived of the soil of our own country. Shut out from other fields of labour, the Irish nation was forced to give itself almost entirely to the cultivation of the soil. Agricultural industry being almost the sole source on which the nation had to depend, it might have been expected that the Imperial Legislature would have regulated the condition of that industry so as to secure the cultivators against the evils of an extravagant competition for land; yet, for 80 years, the Imperial Legislature looked calmly on, till the evils, which grew out of the misery of the nation, reached the point at which they were endurable no longer; and, even then, it took an agitation which convulsed the country from end to end, and a supreme effort on the part of England's greatest statesman as well, to secure some measure of justice for the Irish farmers. The want of all legislative protection to the Irish tenant farmer against the exactions of a grasping landlordism must stand as a condemnation of that Government which arrogated to itself the guardianship of the rights of the Irish people. In less than a century, the landlords of Ireland, as a class, took advantage of the competition for land, occasioned by the practical extinction of other industries, to increase their levies on the labour of the poor beyond all reason; but Government did not interfere to assert the plain principles of economical justice in favour of the oppressed. From 1782 to 1874, the Irish rental of the Marquess of Bath rose from £28,000 a-year to £78,189; that of the Earl of Devonshire, from £18,000 to £54,326; that of the Earl of Caledon, from £1,000 to £12,754; that of the Marquess of Conyngham, from £9,000 a-year to £32,644; that of Lord Bantry, from £800 a-year to £14,561; and so on through a melancholy list; and when, at last, the Imperial Legislature was brought, under the pressure of what looked like a social revolution, to take cognizance of this gigantic evil, the Court which it established proclaimed the grievous neglect of the Government by proceeding to cut down the landlords' rentals by from one-fifth to one-quarter, and as its courage grew and its experience increased, by one-third, one-half, and even a higher fraction. If the proceedings of that Court are but the assertion of the principles of strict economical justice, what are we to say of the system of government which delayed 80 years to establish it—which waited until the country was on the verge of ruin before initiating remedial legislation? The further evils which government by the Imperial Legislature has brought upon Ireland have, of late years at least, become familiar to the ears of the Members of this House. Our educational system neglected, or, if not neglected, constructed in direct antagonism to the wishes of the nation, the law administered by partizan Judges and by ascendancy magistrates; the public offices in the gift of men who were most frequently at open war with the country, and filled by strangers whom they thought most likely to serve their purposes—a system of Administration in no way amenable to the public opinion of the nation, and supported in every unpopular act by the public opinion and the Press of another people. Famine at stated times; the Constitution suspended periodically; and, finally, the usual outcome of tyrannical government, chronic disaffection, and at due intervals spasmodic rebellion. I do not make these assertions in any contentious spirit. The Irish Question has now reached a phase in which the Representatives of Ireland may dispense with long arguments. The political Parties in this House are, I venture to believe, in accord as to what is due to Ireland in justice. The difference between them is a difference as to how much of justice shall be conceded. Concession is inevitable, and, let me add, the concession of the full measure of our rightful claims is inevitable. There is much talk about the choice between coercion and justice. I do not believe that the advocates of coercion put the least faith in it themselves; and I make bold to assert that, from coercion, England has much more to fear than we have. We have reached a depth of political misfortune in which we have nothing to lose but the modicum of individual and public liberty which we are permitted to enjoy during the periods when the Constitution is not suspended by Act of Parliament. Commercial prosperity we have not, and it is difficult to imagine a worse condition of our agricultural industries than that in which we find ourselves at this moment. What, then, have we to lose by coercion? The additional Army that coercion would quarter on us would be but a trifling addition to the evils we have to wince under already. But what has England to fear from coercion? I have no hesitation in asserting that the statesman who, at this moment, would enter into a course of repressive legislation towards Ireland would deserve the reprobation of every man who values the dignity and the stability of this Empire. A people that have suffered, as few peoples have suffered, are willing to forget their injuries, and to join the people of England in maintaining a common Empire. They are willing to lend to the support of the Imperial power the strength of a people whose day is only beginning; they are joined in their friendly advances by the millions of their race scattered over the face of the globe, and the sympathy of every nation in which freedom is a sacred thing with them in their endeavour. Sir, I do not envy the man who can look with a light heart on the results that must follow if their advances are rejected. They have expressed their demands in the form and through the channels prescribed by your Constitution. They have unanimously asked from you the privilege you have accorded to many other peoples within the Empire. If you refuse them, you will have to deal with an insulted and maddened nation, familiar with the methods of political organization, united at home, and supported by their kinsmen in Britain and in every region under the sun; and you will have this hostile opinion at home and abroad impregnably strengthened and irresistibly justified, by the fact that the Prime Minister of England has proclaimed their demands to be just, and declared it your duty to satisfy them. United in the demand for mere justice, supported by the public opinion of the civilized world and by the enthusiastic sympathy of their own kinsmen, vindicated in their determination by the Prime Minister of England and by the most enlightened as well as the most patriotic of England's sons, they cannot be defeated. A cause that can command such resources must succeed, were the opposition against it ten times what it is. The certainty of our success is the best guarantee that we will never relax our endeavours. I trust it will be a motive to the hon. Gentleman who are opposed to us to relax somewhat of their opposition. They may be able to delay justice, or to minimize the measure of justice accorded to us; but a triumph of that kind would be a national disaster. It would not prevent us reaching the end we seek, but would leave us without friendly feeling towards those who had hindered us. If it is important that the relations of Ireland to England should henceforth be those of cordial friendliness, those who seek to make ungracious the concessions which must ultimately come, are doing scant service to both countries. It has been the misfortune of English remedial legislation for Ireland that every concession has always come too grudgingly to command our gratitude. I trust that mistake will not be committed now; and that all who are concerned for the welfare of both nations will concur to make this last concession a basis of genuine concord between them for all time to come. We have been asked for guarantees of loyalty to the Empire. The best guarantee in our case is that of self-interest. Make it worth while for us to be loyal, and we will be so. Make the Irish people a recognized member of the Imperial system, and they will be faithful. Permit us to share in the Imperial prosperity, and we will defend the Empire of which we are a part; and we will sacrifice, if needs be, our properties and our lives to uphold its greatness and enhance its glory. And can't also upon our gratitude. We are willing to take the great Leader of this House and his Colleagues as the exponents of the wishes and feelings of the people of England towards us and towards the people for whom we now speak; we are disposed to be grateful. We know they have done a just deed; and on account of the generosity they have shown, we are willing to forget the littleness and the bigotry which have opposed them. As to the insulting predictions that we should plunder the property of our fellow-subjects if power were placed in our hands, if we are able to govern at all we must be able to govern with justice, and we shall have as much interest in making the minority contented in Ireland as the British Government could have in protecting it. I pass by the foolish appeal to the prejudices of the British traders, which represent us as excluding British manufactures from our markets. The common sense of the ordinary British trader will convince him that, in a prosperous and thriving Ireland, he is likely to have a better market for his wares than in the empty towns and ruined villages of Ireland in her present state. These pretended difficulties are not worthy of the consideration of thoughtful men. Hon. Members, in discussing this question, should look to higher issues. They should, I think, be swayed chiefly by motives dictated by justice between nations, and by the honest desire to undo a great national wrong and alleviate a great national misery. On behalf of the people of Ireland, we now ask for justice from the people of England. We appeal to them to cast aside unworthy prejudices, and to accord us generously the rights we claim. If they will concede to us the privilege of self-government, if they will grant us our rightful share in the Imperial dignity, we will contribute to the support of the common Empire with the enthusiastic zeal and unconstrained devotion of a free and grateful people.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER (Isle of Wight): I am sure that everyone who has heard the hon. Baronet must feel that, from his point of view, he has made a moderate speech, and one which shows that he has the interest he speaks to very close to his heart; but I feel that we must not, at the present time, blind our eyes to the fact that the Irish Members in the House have an object in view which they surely conceal, and that their speeches are not made for the purpose of showing what their real feelings are. Those, on the other hand, who venture to oppose this measure have got their responsibilities to regard towards their country, and their duty to regard towards Ireland as well as towards England. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister made an appeal yesterday to some section of the followers of his Party, and pointed out to them the responsibility that rests upon each one of them. Does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that the opponents of the measure do not feel the responsibility of their position? Does he think that we are careless or indifferent to the duties we owe to the country and the House? I trust that the Prime Minister, and those right hon. Gentlemen who have assisted him, will pardon me if, in expressing my views in opposition to this measure, I may, perhaps, do so in somewhat stronger language than they may think befitting in their much greater experience. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will admit that I have the right, to the best of my ability, to present my views to the House. I cannot help noticing that the position of the House, and certainly the position of hon. Members who feel it their duty to oppose this measure, is most peculiar, for we have not got to deal with the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues delivered from the Bench opposite, but we have got to deal with an exposition of policy made at a meeting at which none of us were present. That puts hon. Members who desire to deal thoroughly with the measure in a position of the greatest difficulty, because it will be open to the right hon. Gentleman to say, if by any chance we have not understood correctly his speech as reported in the newspapers—"You have not appreciated what the position was, and what I meant when I made that statement." The hon. Baronet opposite gave a large number of reasons for voting against this Bill, yet, strangely enough, at the end of his speech expressed his intention of voting for it. The hon. Baronet said he could not vote for an abstract Resolution; but what is the House called upon to do at the present time but to vote on an abstract Resolution? [Cries of "No!"] I do not ask hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to assent to my view; but, at the same time, I do ask them to hear the reasons why I suggest to the House that this Bill is no better than an abstract Resolution. There have been some who have spoken in this House who say that they are only prepared to vote for this measure when they see it as a complete scheme; and the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in a speech of unexampled eloquence and of the greatest possible detail, has described the grounds which make the measure, in his opinion, complete. What is our position now? We have at length elicited that there is no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government that this Bill shall ever reach the Committee stage at all. Not only is it that the second reading is to be a mere farce—a mere matter of form—but we are told that this Bill is not again to be presented to the House; but some other Bill is to be proposed that is to embody, as far as we can judge, the measure that the right hon. Gentleman introduced. Sir, if that is not the position, why is it that the right hon. Gentleman, addressing first those present at the meeting, and now, to-night, the House of Commons, has told us that the measure is not to be proceeded with beyond the second reading? The right hon. Gentleman must forgive me for expressing my feelings—they are the feelings of conviction—when I say that I think the Members of the Liberal Party were put in a most humiliating position yesterday. It was conceded to them by the right hon. Gentleman that they might have very good reason for opposing the second reading of the Bill in its present form. It was conceded to them that they might very likely feel that they could not support the second reading of the Bill in its present form; but what were they invited to do? They were invited to vote for the second reading while retaining their liberty to vote against the third reading; and yet, in the very next sentence, they were told that they never would have an opportunity of voting on the third reading. This seems to me an extraordinary thing. Here are these Gentlemen who will go down to posterity as having been at that meeting. Are they, I ask, when their conduct is referred to, to get up, or is someone to get up for them, and say—"It is true we do appear as having supported the Bill; but we only voted for the second reading, on the distinct understanding that we shall have an opportunity of voting against it on the third reading, if the matters of which we complain are not set right in it?" I do not pretend to put this—or even to suggest to the right hon. Gentlemen that I have a right to put this—as a matter of Parliamentary experience. I admit that I may be making a mistake, for I have only been able, in years gone by, to read

from outside what has been said and done in this House; but this I will say, that, as a matter of principle, I can see no difference whatever between the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, and voting for an abstract Resolution, which is repudiated by the right hon. Gentleman. I think the House ought now to have some statement from hon. Members below the Gangway on this side as to whether they do, or do not, approve of the proposed course. I can well understand a certain view being adopted by them. I can well understand the Representatives from Ireland saying—"We are only too glad to take this measure, because it is a step in the direction in which we seek to go;" without openly saying in this House—"It is a platform on which we can stand, in order to make further demands." We can understand that they, with perfect honesty, are entitled to accept what is given to them, and that then, in years to come, they or their successors may ask for more; but I do think, if it is to be understood by the House that those hon. Gentleman are really satisfied not only with this measure, but also with the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government, they ought to say so. I do not think it is fair to the House—it is scarcely fair to Her Majesty's Government, and it is certainly not fair to the opponents of the Bill—that it should be assumed without a statement on their part that they will be satisfied with the course that has been taken. One cannot help being struck by what one reads in some of the Irish organs in regard to this matter. Of course, hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway may say I have no right to refer to this paper, when they have heard what I am going to read; but I find this passage in a paper which is, I believe, not unconnected with some of the hon. Members below the Gangway—

"The proposal to withdraw the Bill, either before or after the second reading, is absolutely out of the question. It would be a defeat more disastrous than could, by any possibility, be sustained in the Lobby."

Does the hon. Baronet below the Gangway agree to that? If that is the position, the hon. Members below the Gangway, instead of supporting the proposal, ought to let the House know what is their opinion of the proposed second reading. The same organ goes on to state—

"The proposal to strike out the clause excluding the Irish Members from the Westminster Parliament is no less inadmissible. It will be a gratuitous admission by the Government that they are wrong in the main point of their Irish policy, and that they dare not take the judgment of Parliament on that particular proposal."

What I say is, that if this does express the views of a section of those who are represented by the Irish Members, I think that in candour the latter ought to let the House know what their opinion is of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in offering to withdraw the Bill after the second reading in order to save a defeat which is otherwise inevitable. I will now pass to so much as has been left of the measure, and to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, which I read with a great deal of attention, in The Times of this morning. I apologize to the right hon. Gentleman if I am misrepresenting his views. I have only brought to bear on the matter such explanation as I could, putting the two things together; but I must say I have less difficulty in speaking against the second reading to-night, because if the right hon. Gentleman is true to the statement he has made—if he does not change again as he has changed so many times in the course of these discussions—"No, no!" Well, I must be allowed to express my own opinion. I will submit to criticism. I have never shirked it, at any rate, in this House. I cannot reconcile the various statements of the right hon. Gentleman, even in the course of the debate on this Bill, without coming to the conclusion that he has changed his opinions. I therefore say that if the right hon. Gentleman does remain true to the exposition of policy given at the Foreign Office on Thursday, the principal blots and objections and vices of this measure will still continue in it, or in the Bill that is to be introduced, and the measure brought in on these lines would be open to the Constitutional objections that have been raised by more than one hon. Member in this House to the measure as it at present stands. A great deal of the debate during the last few nights has turned upon the speeches of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury Sir Henry James and the hon. and learned Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), and I do not wonder at it. I do not wonder that the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bryce), the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld), and the hon. Member for the Wisbech Division of Cambridge-shire (Mr. Rigby) should, in their turn, have attempted to answer those speeches. It is, at any rate, my duty to say what my view, and what our view on this side of the House, is upon this question; and I do not hesitate to say—not as a matter of doubt, not as a matter of opinion which I am afraid to quote, not as a matter of statement which I desire to withdraw—that if this Bill passes in its present shape, or if an amended measure is brought in in the shape indicated in the Prime Minister's speech, the authority and supremacy of the Imperial Parliament will be seriously impaired. Sir, this, at any rate, is clear—and I am not going to deal with it from any special-pleading point of view. I am going to test what the right hon. Gentleman called “the root and substance of the matter”—this is clear, from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and from the clauses which exist in the Bill, that certain matters are intended to be put within the exclusive domain of a Legislative Body in Ireland, and that these matters, upon the face of the Bill, are to be excepted from the supremacy and from the domain of this House of Commons. The hon. Member for Wisbech, speaking to-night, said that it would be right to postpone all consideration of the clauses of the Bill until the Committee stage—a very safe observation to make, because it is a stage which will never be reached. But I protest against the doctrine that in discussing the fundamental parts of the measure we ought not to regard the provisions of the clauses as presented to the House for the purpose of second reading. These clauses were referred to by the right hon. Gentleman who spoke yesterday: and I say again that Clause 37 provides in so many terms that that which is left to the Irish Legislative Body is no longer within the power of this British House of Commons. I am perfectly willing to read the language; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary cannot plead ignorance of the language to which I refer—

[Seventh Night.]

Sir Richard Webster

“Save as herein expressly provided, all matters in relation to which it is not competent for the Irish Legislative Body to make or repeal laws shall remain and be within the exclusive authority of the Imperial Parliament save as aforesaid, whose power and authority in relation thereto shall in no wise be diminished or restrained by anything herein contained.”

I will not deal with this by blinking the subject. I will point out a reason why, if the Bill were to pass, the supremacy of Parliament would be seriously impaired; but I will for a moment adopt the language of the right hon. Gentleman and say that if, after the passing of this measure, which purports to give not merely municipal government, but an Irish Legislature, which purports to give to that Irish Legislature the power of making every law, and the power of altering every law, except in so far as is excepted by Clause 3 and Clause 4, and which only reserves to this House of Commons—the Imperial Parliament as it will then be—those matters which are not handed over to the Irish Legislature—if, I say, after the passing of this measure, this House were to pass a Bill respecting one of those matters that are assigned, it would be guilty of a gross breach of faith, and will do that which will be far more than a breach of some technical rule of law. I listened with the greatest interest to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. He knows how I respect his opinion. He knows how I should look for guidance from him in such a matter, and I was astonished to hear that, though he quoted the speeches of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), beyond saying that their arguments were futile, he never ventured by argument to point out in what respect they had erred. It does not make an argument bad to call it a futile one. Though the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech was eloquent and moving on general topics, I think the House was entitled to have some exposition from him—something more than the statement that the arguments to which I refer were futile. He ought to have dealt with such a matter as this very much more in detail. I am not going to weary the House with technical matters. I want it to remember that there is one part of this Bill that seems to be lost sight of by all the lawyers who have attempted to advocate the Bill. The Attorney General talked of the 30 Legislative Bodies in the British Empire. Does he forget—I am sure he does not—but does the House forget that not one of the countries, districts, or peoples who have a separate Legislative Body ever had representation in the Imperial Parliament? It is, I say, one thing by a grant of the Crown, or a grant of Parliament, or, it may be, by some other Constitutional means, to give certain limited powers of legislation, reserving—as always has been hitherto reserved in express terms—the power of the Imperial Parliament; but it is quite another thing where you take a section of the House—a section, entitled to the same rights as we have, a section who now form an integral part of the Imperial Parliament—and say—“We will cut you adrift; we will place you in another country, and give you separate legislative rights.” I do not hesitate to say that, looked at from a practical point of view, looked at from the point of view of making a Parliamentary contract with these Gentlemen who have the right to represent Ireland, it is an entirely different thing to say—“Leave this House, and leave it on the terms that you shall have the sole right of legislating in Ireland in respect of Irish affairs,” and to say to some Colony, who has never had representation—“We give you the right of autonomy, subject to the express power reserved to the British Parliament of legislating, if they think fit, and of your being bound to obey their laws.” I think I may make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to deal with this point when he addresses the House. He will do me the justice of saying that I am not treating it in the least degree in a technical manner. I think we are entitled to say, having regard to the precedents of the India Act and the Colonial Laws Act, and having regard to the admission made by the Attorney General, that this Bill was framed on the lines of those Acts, the omission of clauses analogous to those expressly reserving to the Imperial Parliament the right of legislating for the Colonies—the omission of a clause enabling the Imperial Parliament to legislate on Irish matters—was in itself significant. But I say, further, that the Prime Minister made no question about it. When he introduced this Bill he made it perfectly clear that he did not intend that this English Parliament should legislate in respect of Irish affairs as distinct from Imperial affairs. What was his language? He said that there could not be a Domestic Legislature in Ireland dealing with Irish affairs and Irish Representatives sitting in Parliament to take part in English and Scotch Business. It is perfectly clear that if Ireland is to have a Domestic Legislature Irish Peers and Irish Representatives cannot come here to control Irish Business. I appeal to the House whether the meaning of this was not that, as Irishmen are to have exclusive rights in regard to Irish affairs, therefore they have no right to come and interfere with English and Scotch affairs? If the right hon. Gentleman meant that there should be a practical power of legislation in this House with regard to Irish affairs, I will do him the justice to say he would have said so, and would not have allowed the House to remain under the false impression it did. If this Bill passes into law with the clause in it giving the Irish Legislature the exclusive right to deal with Irish affairs, and reserving to the English Parliament no right to deal with Irish affairs, and if, at the same time, the clause stands which declares that the Bill can only be repealed and altered in the presence of the Irish Members, all that I can say is that it would be practically impossible and against the terms of the Bill for the Imperial Parliament to pass an Act of Parliament dealing with Irish affairs without repealing this Bill. It may be possible that such a breach of faith may be committed by the British House of Commons; but, if it were possible, it would be so gross a breach of faith that I cannot conceive that it is a matter which ought to come within the range of practical politics. Now, let us for a moment consider one or two other matters in respect of which the power of the Imperial Parliament is seriously impaired. It has astonished me that it occurred to no one—at any rate, on the Government side—to point out the extraordinary nature of the veto given to the Privy Council by the 25th section. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented to the use of the word “veto.”] I beg the right hon. Gentleman’s pardon. Perhaps I have used a wrong expression. I think he will see in a moment what I mean—that the Privy Council have the right of deciding finally whether or not an Act of Parliament passed by the Irish Legislature is, or is not, beyond the scope of that Legislature to pass. I used the word “veto.” Unfortunately, I am not the master of language the right hon. Gentleman is; but I am quite willing to make my meaning clear. I was about to refer to what was said by the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld), and certainly the most extraordinary proposition was laid down by him in connection with this matter, and one which I was also sorry to hear somewhat confirmed by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bryce). They said that this idea of submitting these matters to the tribunal of the Privy Council was taken from the well-known precedent—to use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board—of the Supreme Court of the United States. Well, I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman was in the House when the hon. Member for Wisbech (Mr. Rigby) spoke to-night when he referred, perfectly correctly, to the constitution of the Supreme Court of the United States; to what its functions are, and to the functions proposed to be given to the Privy Council. I assert—and I invite the criticism of every right hon. and hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House—that there is no real analogy between the function of the Supreme Court of the United States, which is in itself entirely unique, and the function which it is proposed shall be exercised by the Privy Council. But if the functions of the Privy Council are as the right hon. Gentleman assumed, then the power of the Imperial Parliament is most seriously impaired. It was pointed out by the hon. Member for Wisbech, that by the Constitution of the United States the Legislatures of the different States have equal rights, and if by any chance any Act passed by those States should be contrary to the terms of the Constitution, the function of the Supreme Court is to set it aside. There is nothing at all analogous to that in the British Constitution. [Mr. Bryce here interposed with some words of dissent.] I can assure the hon. Gentleman

the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that I have not the smallest objection to being corrected. Perhaps he did not hear the speech of the hon. Member for Wisbech. The hon. Member stated the fact with perfect correctness. He said that the right of the Supreme Court of the United States is to control the State Legislatures within the terms of the Constitution. [Mr. Bryce: To interpret the Constitution.] What is the distinction for this purpose between interpretation and control? [“Oh, oh!”] The hon. Member is trifling with terms, for if an Act of one Legislature in the Union is passed, and it is contrary to the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court interprets it as being invalid and beyond its power, and that, I maintain, may be interpretation, but it is also control. I can give chapter and verse of instances in which the legislation of one of the federated States has been held to be ultra vires by the Supreme Court of the United States; but there is nothing analogous to this in the British Constitution. The nearest approach is that, in regard to Colonial legislation, the Privy Council has certain powers in the matter of the Royal Assent being given; but I need not tell the House, because it has been admitted by many right hon. Gentlemen, that the Imperial Parliament can pass an Act overruling the decision of the Privy Council in any such matter. Will the House bear with me whilst I point out what the provisions of this Bill are? By the provisions of this Bill in regard to this matter, if the Irish Legislature passes an Act beyond the scope of its authority, under Clauses 3 and 4, this would be submitted to the Privy Council, whose decision would be final. But if the supremacy of Parliament is to be left unimpaired, the power of deciding whether the Irish Parliament has exceeded its authority should, of course, rest with the Imperial Parliament. What, then, becomes of the finality of the Privy Council's decision, if it is not intended to override the power of this House? No doubt, the immense ingenuity of those who are advocating this Bill will be brought to bear upon this matter, and that we shall be told that there is some different view to be taken. But where is it in the Bill? You find it stated in the measure that the judgment of the Privy Council is to be final, and, under the circumstances I have pointed out, the exercise of that judgment would be a complete infraction of the supremacy of Parliament, unless it is understood that the authority of the Privy Council is never to be put in force. When it is sought to justify this part of the measure by an appeal to the existence of the Supreme Court of the United States, all I can say is that the Supreme Court of the United States has nothing in common with the Privy Council, for there is no tribunal here which can control the Imperial Parliament or interpret its Statutes in the same way that the Supreme Court of the United States can interpret the Acts which have been passed by the federated States. Now, there is one other matter upon which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury Sir Henry James has been entirely and completely misunderstood. I forget whether it was the Attorney General or the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or both, who referred to it, but they have said there is no possibility of a judicial conflict. I should like just for a moment to put to the House what the true position of matters is. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has said it will be competent for this House to pass an Act of Parliament respecting Irish matters the day after this Bill is passed. Well, if that be so, it is contrary to the provisions to which I have referred relating to the jurisdiction, both of this House and of the Irish Legislature, with respect to Irish matters. But assume that this Parliament did pass Acts in direct contradiction to some of those passed by the Irish Parliament. Now, what would be the position of an Irish Judge who had brought before him an Act of the British House of Parliament—I speak, of course, of the House of Parliament sitting at Westminster when the Irish Members are not here? Suppose an Act of this kind dealing with Irish affairs, laying down a different law to the Acts passed by the Irish Legislature, came before an Irish Judge, what would be his position? I say that, adopting the principle of Constitutional Law that has been recognized by every lawyer who has spoken in this debate, no Court of Law would venture to question the right of Parliament to legislate in any case—I say that, adopting that principle, it would be incumbent upon the Irish Judge to follow the law of the Irish Parliament. ["No, no!"] I am perfectly willing, as I have said more than once, to submit to criticism; but it is only fair to listen to my arguments. The Judge would have before him an Act of Parliament passed by an Irish Legislature—an Act which would have received the Royal Assent. He would have before him this Act—the Magna Charta of the Irish people, according to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister—whereby, on the face of it, there was left to the English Parliament, as I have already urged, no right of dealing with the matters which were committed to the Irish Legislature. In following the Statute passed by the Irish Parliament, this Judge would have the encouragement of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who has told us that the laws passed for Ireland by this Parliament, even when the Irish Members are here, are foreign laws. If they are foreign laws whilst the Irish Members are here, how much more will they be foreign laws in every way when the Irish Members are absent? I do not hesitate to say that if we are to place the Irish Judges, who would owe no allegiance to the British House of Commons, in conflict with the English Parliament, it would be the duty of the Irish Judges to obey the Irish Parliament. They would be removable by the vote, or rather the Address, of the Irish Legislature, and if, as I say, a conflict arose, they would naturally obey the Acts of the Irish Parliament. It may be said—"It is all very fine to make these statements, but in such criticisms as these hon. Members who oppose the Bill seem to assume that the Irish people are either criminals or lunatics." I was sorry to hear language of that kind used by the Attorney General. Has anyone ever heard from these Benches any insinuation that the Irish people are criminals or lunatics? One may have thought them misled and misguided, and to be under influences which are not for the best, and which have for their result that the true opinion of the nation is not elicited at the elections; but, at any rate, we have never attributed to the Irish nation the suggestion or idea that they were going to act either as criminals or lunatics. We are taunted with having criticised the "safeguards," and with having pointed out that they are not sufficient, and that the Imperial Parliament will be shorn of some of its supremacy. It does seem strange to me that these taunts should come from right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are responsible for this Bill. For where do we find the strongest testimony that the framers of the Bill feel that the dominant Party—meaning thereby the Party represented by the Home Rulers—are not to be trusted? It is in the Bill itself. The hon. and learned Attorney General—and I hear him making the remark again sotto voce—twitted us the other night because some of us who contend that this Bill would impair the authority of Parliament, have also pointed out that that which is to be given to the Irish nation ought not to satisfy them. These arguments are not inconsistent. I wish to show that this measure has not been carefully thought out. I also wish to show that the framers of the Bill have considered that the power which was going to prevail in Ireland was not a power which was entitled to full trust and confidence. I will not, except in one passing reference, allude to the Land Purchase Bill; but it does seem to me, whatever view may be taken of the right of this House to deal separately or together with the two measures, that the Prime Minister himself represented that, in the opinion of the Government, the union of the two measures was necessary. If there was that absolute trust and confidence in the Party that was to have the dominant influence in Ireland, what was the necessity for the introduction of a measure framed in these terms? But it does not stand there. I am referring to what is on the face of the Bill. Will any hon. Gentleman get up and say that the Irish Judges have not done their duty? Will Earl Spencer, or anyone who has had a knowledge of the course of judicial business in Ireland in these troublous times, say that these men—these Judges—have not done their duty gallantly? They have enforced the law as representatives of the Queen, and have done in their own country what the Judges of Her Majesty are in the habit of doing. Will the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley), or any other responsible Member of the Government, say that Mr. Justice Lawson, Mr. Justice Murphy, and Mr. Justice O'Brien are not worthy of the confidence of Her Majesty? I do not think it could be said that they were not gentlemen in whom the Prime Minister had confidence when some of them sat on the Front Bench beside him. I say that no one will suggest that these Judges have not been worthy of respect and esteem; yet so little confidence has the right hon. Gentleman in the dominant Party in Ireland that he provides for the retirement of the Judges, if they wish to retire, and enacts that they shall be obliged to abdicate the duties which they have fulfilled to their own credit, and to the safety of the nation; and here, again, I will not fence at all with the question, but will take the right hon. Gentleman's own language. Is the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General quite right in suggesting that this is a fear that is only expressed by those who think the Irish nation is composed of criminals or lunatics? Had he in his mind the language of his great and eminent Leader when he threw that reproach in our teeth? I will quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman, which seem to me a complete refutation of the words of the Attorney General—

“Some of the Judges, by no fault of their own, have been placed in relations more or less uneasy with popular influences, and with what, under the new Constitution, will, in all probability, be the dominating influence in that country.”

It seems to me—I will not use the word “unfair,” because we know the Attorney General would not be unfair intentionally—but it seems to me hardly just, when these provisions, which will protect men who have only done their duty against dominating influences, are inserted in the Bill, to suggest that we are the persons who are afraid that the Judges in Ireland will not do their duty. I do not wish to-night to deal with the question of the connection between the Legislative and the Executive. It has been amply dealt with by the hon. and learned Member for the Romford Division of Essex (Mr. Westlake), and I do not think it would be right to detain the House with further argument when it has been so well put by the hon. and learned Gentleman; but I will say this, that I share the feelings and the views of the hon. and learned Member, and it does seem to me to be a most serious thing that we are to have a complete

severance between the Legislative and Executive, and that we are to have no control over those Ministers who represent the Offices of State in Ireland. It involves serious questions as to the Army, and as to the action of the Military Forces in Ireland, who cannot act of themselves, but only on the authority of the Civil power—questions which, in my opinion, call for some answer, and which, I trust, some Member of the Government will be able to answer. I will content myself with adopting the hon. and learned Gentleman's arguments. I have but a few more general observations to make, and I crave indulgence in making them, because we all feel the importance of the question. The President of the Local Government Board, in order, I presume, to inflame the feelings of the House, has said that the feelings of Ireland are the result of many years of obstinate injustice and repression. If the right hon. Gentleman had referred to what had happened 30 or 40 years ago, I should have absolutely and entirely agreed with him; but if he referred to what has happened during the last 20 years, then I contend that there is no ground whatever for the assertion. I do not wish to quote the Prime Minister, but the House knows perfectly well that the right hon. Gentleman has asserted more than once that there is nothing which Ireland has asked for that this country and this Parliament have refused. I wish to call the attention of the House to the very remarkable difference between the present cry and that which existed in former times. Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Butt were able to state to the House grievances which existed, and which required Parliamentary remedy by legislation; and in many instances, if not in all, the House admitted that their complaints were right. Have hon. Members below the Gangway been able to quote a case of legislation which is now required for Ireland with which this House is not competent to deal? Is it to be said that the British House of Parliament has so fallen, that it cannot respond to the just appeals of the Representatives of the Irish nation in their places in the Imperial Parliament? It seems to me that such a supposition is little short of an insult to the British House of Commons. Before the introduction of a measure of this kind, we ought to know in what respect the Imperial House of Commons has failed to do its duty to Ireland. Another matter has been mentioned, and as it is a matter of most serious importance, I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in his place whilst I refer to it. When my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury Sir Henry James was speaking, he referred to some observations of the Chief Secretary, and apparently, or at any rate to the mind of the Chief Secretary, misquoted those observations. I do not know that there was a misquotation, but the Chief Secretary repeated his words. I shall read to the House the words of the Chief Secretary; and when it is suggested that this measure is put forward in the interests of the Irish nation; when it is said to be a measure of peace that is demanded by the Irish people, what is it that the Irish Secretary said with regard to this measure of peace? I took down his words on that occasion. The words were—

"The dynamiters and assassins will be very delighted if you reject this Bill."

Now, what does that mean? Does it mean that this House is going to make a bargain with dynamiters and assassins? "No!" Then, what is the meaning of the statement that they will rejoice if you reject this Bill? All I can say is, that this is pointing to that spirit of fear which was repudiated by Mr. Disraeli, when he spoke in that debate referred to by the Prime Minister, and when he said we ought to vote on the measure as Englishmen, and not with the fear that we should meet Rory of the Hills in the Lobby. It seems to me that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is unworthy of him.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND Mr. JOHN MORLEY Newcastle-on-Tyne: The hon. and learned Gentleman absolutely misconstrues the force and drift of my argument. My argument was that if you reject this Bill you will divert the movement in Ireland from the hands of Constitutional agitators into the hands of violent Extremists on the other side of the Atlantic.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Nobody can quote the exact words of the right hon. Gentleman without misunderstanding him. I have quoted the words, and I will submit to the judgment of the House. What is—

"Diverting the movement in Ireland from the hands of Constitutional agitators into the hands of violent Extremists"

but saying that we must be afraid of rejecting this Bill, because the fact of its rejection will rejoice the dynamiters and assassins? Perhaps it appears to me in that light owing to the infirmity of my own mind. If he can show me that I have misunderstood his argument, I will gladly admit it; but at present I can put no other construction or meaning on his argument. I maintain that dynamiters and assassins are factors which ought to be left out of the calculation altogether. We have suffered enough, God knows! through them in the past, and there are those amongst us who know that the course pursued by Liberal Governments on other occasions have led to some terrible results; but I say that the Government is surely not so craven and cowardly as to be affected by such arguments as those. But it is not from the right hon. Gentleman alone that we have heard these arguments. I trust the House will remember the observations made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who is, I think, not present. No one doubts his sincerity. I have never for one moment doubted the sincerity of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. They know what they want, and, from their point of view, they are fighting honestly for it. I, perhaps, misunderstand the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo, as I misunderstand the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. He says there is a Truce of God in Ireland—there is a Truce of God in this House. With whom is this truce? Why is it we are appealed to to continue this truce to-night? It can only be that it is supposed that by passing this Bill the truce which the introduction of this measure has begun will be continued with the Extremists, who are capable of outrageous acts. ["No, no!"] Well, I know of no other Party to whom the hon. Member could refer, and it would be a monstrous thing if we were afraid of doing justice to Ireland, as well as to other parts of the United Kingdom, under a fear of this kind. Then the phrase "cessation of hostility between the two peoples" is used, and it is a remarkable thing that the fact that there is no hostility between England and Ireland should be spoken of as "a Truce of God in Ireland and a Truce of God in this House." How has this hostility been shown? The Extremists have adopted the system of conducting matters by violent means. We do not need to have any fear of the legitimate Representatives in Ireland. They have the most perfect right to represent their views in most forcible language, and they certainly do adopt a forcible method of bringing their wishes and desires before us. But to speak of this cessation of the use of this method as "a Truce of God," is a remarkable thing, and I should scarcely think the hon. Member for East Mayo, if he were here, would defend the words. I have plainly—and I hope in not too strong language—put my convictions before the House. The Tory Party feel their responsibilities just as much as hon. Gentlemen opposite feel theirs. But I cannot help saying one word, in conclusion, with regard to this measure, of which we are never to be allowed to discuss the details, and which we are only to deal with as an abstract proposition of Home Rule—Home Rule being, as has been over and over again pointed out, a thing which may mean anything until the details are fully explained. Sir, I wonder if it ever crosses the minds of those who are prepared to follow the Prime Minister with such blind obedience what the real position of this legislation has been. It was repudiated by the Prime Minister himself in December last. ["No, no!"] An hon. Gentleman opposite says "No!" He may have been in the secrets of the Prime Minister. He may have understood the original utterances of the right hon. Gentleman; but how did the honest people outside understand the language of the Prime Minister in December last? When the scheme was first put forward in a semi-authorized version it was repudiated by the right hon. Gentleman in language that convinced the nation at large that there was no such scheme. There was nothing that would have justified any reasonable man in coming to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman meant to bring in such a scheme. The scheme, however, repudiated by him in December last was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman a few weeks ago, supported by the remnants of a shattered, and, adopting the Prime Minister's phrase, I might say an almost emasculated Cabinet seeking to obtain safety on the wreckage of a disorganized Party. It is by such means as these that it is hoped safety can be attained by Her Majesty's Government at the present time. Of the ultimate passing of this measure I have no real fear. [Cheers and counter cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen must not misunderstand me; I do not think they will affect to do so. I have no fear that the Bill will ever pass. The House and the feelings of the nation will be true to that which is right and just in this matter. What I am afraid of is the influence that the fact that such a measure could have been introduced by the Prime Minister may have upon the ignorant classes to whom the right hon. Gentleman has appealed. ["No, no!"] Do hon. Gentlemen opposite repudiate the language of the Prime Minister? Has not the Prime Minister admitted, in his Manifesto, that the professional classes, the men who have to work by their brains, are against him? It is because I fear the influence on the uneducated classes that I think it dangerous and most disastrous that this measure should have been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman. It is to be feared that, for many years to come, the proposal of this measure has inflicted a serious blow on the bond of Union between England and Ireland—a bond that can only be strengthened by straightforward and honest adherence to a moderate and firm policy of law and order. Sir, I trust that the independent opinion of the country will join the independent opinion in this House in resisting a measure which can bring no lasting benefit to Ireland, and can only injure the United Kingdom, of which Ireland is a part.

Mr. John Morley, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. Attorney General.

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

On Motion of The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. John Morley, the following Amendments made:—Page 1, Clause 2, line 14, leave out "June," and insert "December;" Sub-section 2, line 14, leave out "first," and insert "thirtieth;" leave out "eight," and insert "seven;" Clause 3, line 24, after "granted," insert "and the number of prosecutions ordered and the results."

Motion made, and Question put,
 "That the Bill be now read the third time."—Mr. John Morley.)

The House divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 65: Majority 91.—[Div. List, No. 111.]

Bill read the third time, and passed.

LOSSES BY RIOT (COMPENSATION)

BILL.—[Bill 209.]

Mr. Childers, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Attorney General.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 24th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Compensation to persons for damage by riot).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill a question on a subject which, in some parts of the country, is considered of importance—that is, the subject of areas. It has been already mentioned in the discussion on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, and I am under the impression that the right hon. Gentleman said he would make inquiries in the matter. For the sake of putting myself in Order, I shall move to strike out the words "police district," in the first line of the clause, for the purpose of inserting the word "hundred." It appears to me that the Bill, as it is drawn, will very much alter the incidence of the rate. I take the case of my own county. It is divided into hundreds, which are, for all money purposes, found to be satisfactory; we have hundred rates, and if a disturbance should take place in Liverpool or in Manchester I am convinced that the people living in the northern part of the county would feel it a very great hardship if they are called upon to pay for the first time for damages caused by riots with which they have nothing to do. This system of hundreds has worked perfectly well; it is well understood; and, therefore, I ask the right hon. Gentleman why, for the purpose of this Bill, he has taken the police districts? I am aware that he has placed a clause in the Compensation for Damages Bill, which provides that the police district shall be the rating area. That may be quite right; but I do not think the analogy holds in the case of the counties, some of which are very large, and where it would be a great hardship for the inhabitants at one end of the county to be called upon to pay for the damage done at the other.

—(Sir R. Asheton Cross.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. CHILDERS) (Edinburgh, S.): It is quite true that in Lancashire the hundreds have certain duties with respect to bridges, and there is in the Highways Act of 1878 a provision that the rating area should be the hundred. That is the only county, I believe, where this is the case, except possibly Gloucestershire, about which I am not quite certain; but these are the only two counties, at any rate. I have taken pains to look into this matter in consequence of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and have arrived at the conclusion that it is better to adopt the police area for the purpose of this Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the trouble he has taken in this matter; but yet I do not think he has quite answered the contention of my right hon. Friend that the county of Lancashire is so large that a rate to pay for the damage caused by a riot at one part of it would be regarded as a tax for the purpose of repairing injury with which the people in another part of it had nothing to do. I have suggested that it would be better to take a different area, and I do not see why the Union area should not be adopted, which would practically come to the same thing in the end, and would be felt to be more uniform—that is to say, more just to the large areas and less burdensome to the small.

MR. CHILDERS: I have a prima facie objection to this proposal, founded upon the different bodies of police in counties; but I will take the subject into consideration before the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Mode of awarding compensation).

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I ought to apologize to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Childers) for not having put the few Amendments I desire to move on the Paper, in order to enable him to understand them the better. I rise now to move an Amendment, in line 21, to leave out the words "published in The London Gazette," in order to insert the words "laid before Parliament." We are very familiar with regulations which are framed to carry out Acts of Parliament, and we are aware of the difficulties which have arisen in consequence. This clause appears to give very extensive powers of making regulations to the Secretary of State; and I submit that the proper mode of dealing with the matter is to provide that the regulations which he may frame shall be laid upon the Table of this House.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 21, to leave out the words "published in The London Gazette," and insert the words "laid before Parliament."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. CHILDERS) (Edinburgh, S.): I can assure the hon. Member that these words are merely formal, for the regulations must, of course, be published. Does the hon. Member mean, however, that the regulations shall be laid on the Table of the House in order that they may be open to revision by the House, or in order that the public shall know of them?

MR. TOMLINSON: What I was in hopes of was that the right hon. Gentleman would have given us some actual precedent for the course which has been adopted in regard to this clause. I should like to know whether it has ever been the case that an Act of Parliament has been administered by the Secretary of State publishing regulations in The London Gazette?

MR. CHILDERS: Oh, yes, Sir; that is so. There are hundreds of Acts of Parliament which have been administered in that way; but, as a matter of fact, that does not happen in this case.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 Right of action to person aggrieved).

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to move to omit Sub-section 2 of this clause. It may be proper that the County Court should have jurisdiction up to £100; but what I want to know is, what is there in these matters to take them out of the ordinary rule as to jurisdiction? I submit that there is nothing to take them out of the ordinary rule, and therefore I move to omit the words.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Sub-section (2.)"—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the Sub-section stand part of the Clause."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. CHILDERS) (Edinburgh, S.): It is thought that these are just the sort of actions that will be taken under this Bill. I hope the hon. Member will not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT Mr. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I now beg to move the following new Clause:—

"The police authority of any district other than the City of London or the Metropolitan Police District may, if they think fit, within one month after the passing of this Act, by order declare that claims for compensation under this Act may be made in respect of losses sustained within such district during any period not exceeding twelve months next before the passing of this Act, and thereupon the said authority may allow such compensation if any as they think fit, and the compensation so allowed shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of this Act with respect to not expenses in like manner as if such expenses had been incurred after the passing of this Act.

"A Secretary of State shall have power to make special regulations under this Act for the purpose of any claims for compensation to be made in pursuance of this section."

There are some verbal Amendments to the clause which I will put into the hands of the Chairman.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottingham, S.): I shall be glad to have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department that he will promptly exercise the power given to him in the clause in regard to the making of special regulations for the purpose of any claims for compensation made in pursuance of this section. I ask for this because only one month is allowed during which the police authorities are to receive claims and adjudicate upon them.

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; I think that that may be promised.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next.

WEST INDIAN INCUMBERED ESTATES BILL. [Lords].—[BILL 233.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN Denbighshire, E.): I beg to move the second reading of this Bill, Sir. It is a short Bill, and the object of it is to provide for the determination of the Acts respecting the sale and transfer of incumbered estates in the West Indies. It has come down from the Lords, and I may say that nearly all the Colonies interested have passed a Resolution in favour of the measure. The Bill only consists of two clauses, the 1st providing that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, from time to time, by Order in Council to direct that the West Indian Incumbered Estates Acts, 1854 and 1872, shall cease to be in operation in the Colony as from the day mentioned in the Order, and such Order in Council shall have effect as if enacted by this Act; but before such Order is made in respect of any Colony an Address from the Legislature of the Colony, praying for the Order, shall be presented to Her Majesty. The 2nd clause contains the machinery for carrying this out. It is very important that the Bill should pass at once, and therefore I hope the House will consent to read it a second time now.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

SIR HENRY HOLLAND (Hampstead): I am not anxious to oppose the second reading of this Bill; but I should like to know how we are to go on in regard to the West Indian Incumbered Estates Court? I understand that all the Colonies are not in favour of abolishing it; and if it is to be abolished, how are the Judges to be paid in the meantime in respect of those Colonies who may desire the Court to continue.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: I believe there will be no difficulty in that respect. All the Colonies except one have already passed Resolutions in favour of the Bill, and we have no reason to doubt that they will all adopt it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL

[Lords]. — [BILL 234.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN) (Denbighshire, E.) I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. It is a very short Bill, and proposes to authorize the representation in the Parliament of Canada of territories which, for the time being, form part of the Dominion of Canada, but are not included in any Province. A Bill with this object has already been read a second time in the Dominion Parliament.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

[BILL 211.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 24th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Review of taxation).

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I beg, Sir, to move the omission of this clause, in order to accept the new clause of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James).

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): In the place of the clause which has just been struck out, Sir, I beg to move the following clause:—

(Review of taxation.)

"The judge or officer by whom any account or claim is taxed or examined under 'The Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) Act, 1875' (herein called the 'principal Act'), shall deliver to the returning officer, and to the other party to the taxation or examination, a certificate showing the items and amounts allowed or disallowed, with a copy of any order or judgment made thereon.

"Either party may, within seven days of the delivery to him of such certificate, give notice in writing to the said judge or officer of intention to appeal, specifying in the notice the items and amounts in respect of which he intends to appeal.

"The said judge or officer shall thereupon forthwith transmit to the prescribed taxing officer of the Superior Court the said account or claim, with any vouchers relating thereto, the certificate and the notice of appeal, and such taxing officer shall forthwith proceed to review the taxation or examination in the usual manner, or in such manner as may be prescribed, and shall, if required, receive evidence in relation to the matters in dispute, and may confirm or vary the certificate, and direct by whom all or any part of the costs of review are to be paid, and shall return the certificate as confirmed or varied to the said judge or officer with any such direction, and effect shall be given to a certificate as so confirmed or varied, and to any such direction, as if the same had been a judgment of the Court as defined in the principal Act.

"In this Act 'Superior Court' means in England the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in England, and in Ireland the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland. 'Prescribed' means prescribed by rules of the Superior Court in England or Ireland, as the case may be."

We thought it better to leave the power of taxing to the Judge, with power of appeal to the Taxing Master of the Superior Court. It is a complicated matter, but we are all in accord upon it.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir CHARLES RUSSELL) (Hackney, S.): The clause which my right hon. and learned Friend proposes is, no doubt, a valuable one; but it appears to me that it would be better if, in the case of large towns like Liverpool or Manchester, the power of taxation were left to be exercised locally.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I desire to move an Amendment to this clause—namely, to insert the words—

"Any taxation or review of taxation under this Act shall be subject to appeal to the Superior Court, in like manner as any ordinary taxation of costs is now subject."

I do not think I need make any remark upon it.

Amendment proposed, to the said proposed Amendment, to insert the words—

"Any taxation or review of taxation under this Act shall be subject to appeal to the Superior Court, in like manner as any ordinary taxation of costs is now subject."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I do not propose to move the new clause which stands in my name.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 241.]

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 99.)

(The Lord Greville.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD GREVILLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the societies proposed to be amended by its provisions might be generally described as societies formed for the purpose of mutual assurance among the working classes, the members making weekly or monthly contributions, in the expectation of receiving allowances in case of sickness or provision for funeral expenses in the event of a death in the family, or securing a payment to the widow on the death of the subscriber. It was required that such societies should be registered, and it was an easy matter for seven men to form a society and register it. They then described it as "registered under an Act of Parliament," and poor men, imagining that these words in themselves afforded some security for the soundness of the society, the integrity of its managers, and the certainty of future benefits, and that they were as safe as if the money had been deposited in the Post Office Savings Banks, paid their deposits for months and years, only to find, in the time of their trouble and need, that they had been really deceived and robbed, and that it was impossible to obtain redress. Many cases of hardship had been brought under his notice, and in one, which was a fine example of the sort, a man who had invested £25 gave notice of his intention to withdraw. After the lapse of two years he was informed that he could not get back his money, but perhaps he might find someone to purchase his interest in the society for the sum of £10. The fact was that no protection was afforded by the legislation, and only recently a number of persons were put upon their guard by detecting these bogus societies, and the public were then surprised to find with what ease such societies could be started. He (Lord Greville) did not ask that the investors in, and subscribers to, these societies should have Government security as the depositors in the Post Office Savings Banks had; but he proposed that no society should be allowed to be registered unless its tables were certified by an actuary as sufficient to enable it to meet its possible obligations. That would be an additional protection to poor men by preventing the starting of societies which could not provide the benefits they offered. The necessity for some further protection of the provident working classes was shown by the fact that 150 of these registered societies had disappeared in the course of a year, and the aggregate of the weekly or periodical payment to these societies probably amounted to £5,000,000 yearly. One did not like saying anything against his own Party; but he was very much surprised that the Liberal Party, who were always appealing to the working classes of the country, declined to take up a matter of this kind in the interests of the poor, thrifty, hard-working, honest working man. The matter was one affecting the whole community, because the more provident working people were, the fewer paupers would there be; and the burden of pauperism was sufficiently onerous to render it incumbent on them to do all they could to encourage habits of thrift and self-dependence among the working classes. He therefore hoped their Lordships would read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Lord Greville.)

LORD NORTON said, he also concurred in the necessity of amending the legislation as regarded these societies, for a more important subject than this could hardly be brought before their Lordships. The great difficulty in legislating on the question of these societies was to promote their soundness without Government guaranteeing it, or seeming to do so. At the present moment, the whole working of the Friendly Societies Act turned upon the Registrar, which, he maintained, did more harm than good, for a guarantee was supposed to be offered by him as to the soundness of the societies, while practically he neither could nor should offer any security whatever. That officer, by the Act of 1875, prepared and circulated model forms of accounts and tables, and collected and published Returns; registered societies which sent their rules to him if he was satisfied that they complied with the conditions of registry, had tables certified by an actuary, and had an office, trustees, and quinquennial audit. The Act, however, failed to give effect to its intention. Two things seemed to him to be wanted—first, that the Registrar should be ready to give assistance by discretionary advice; secondly, that he should be able to enforce what coercive functions he nominally had; either by penalty, or by taking or temporarily suspending societies from his register. As to the first requisite, it was recommended by Lord Iddesleigh's Commission, 1872, on the Report of which the Act of 1875 was drafted, that the Registrar should, at his discretion, give advice to promoters and managers, and popularize and publish information. Those societies were intended to encourage thrift and saving, and their privileges were only justified by their need of such encouragement. Private individuals, without official knowledge or power, often undertook the formation of friendly societies, though not their management. It was right that these societies should be self-governed; but the present Registrar did not give advice and aid to promoters of those useful institutions like his Predecessor, Mr. Tidd Pratt. Perhaps, however, advice unwillingly given would not be worth much. The second requisite was more important than the first which he had mentioned. It was that effect should be given to the coercive powers nominally given in the Act. The case of the Liver Society lately reported sufficiently showed the necessity for that amendment of the law. Its mismanagement came before Sir Stafford Northcote's Commission in 1874; and in the 10 years after that exposure its two secretaries pocketed to their own use, by their own confession, nearly £70,000. They altered rules, "Boycotted" interference, packed meetings, and became registered plunderers of 1,000,000 poor dupes of subscribers. When at last application was made to the Registrar, under the 23rd section of the Act, to look into the matter, he appointed Mr. Lyulph Stanley to report. The result of that Gentleman's inquiry was that since then nothing whatever had been done to improve the management of the society. They had all heard the allegations which had led up to the inquiry; and although the Registrar had received the Report of the Inspector sent to inquire into the matter, he only replied by expressing obligations for suggestions as to the reform of the law, in which he said he partly concurred, and he promised to consider whether any legal proceedings ought to be taken. The Bill, he (Lord Norton) feared, must be altered to meet such impotency on the part of the chief officer under the Act. To say, as it did, that no new society should be registered unless its tables were certified by an official actuary, did not meet the case, and went too far in the way of Government undertaking a guarantee. The Bill should rather say that all such societies as were named in the 6th clause should imperatively be registered, and that failure to report revaluations and audits, at least once in every five years, to the Registrar, should incur the removal or suspension of the society from the Register, and the consequent loss of privileges during suspension. Amendments to that effect might be introduced in Committee. Insurance for sums at death not mentioned in the Bill required an additional clause for security against gross and dangerous abuse. Undertakers frequently got the whole of the sums so insured transferred to themselves for funeral expenses, to the total deprivation of the widow; and that dangerously discouraged all efforts of thrift and saving in the way of insurance. If the Government rejected the Bill as not entirely meeting the case, or for fear of giving too much guarantee to the societies, they were bound to do something without delay to prevent the Registrar doing much harm with little compensating good.

LORD SUDELEY (for the Treasury), in moving the rejection of the Bill, said, it was identical with the one introduced by the noble Lord last year, which their Lordships rejected on the second reading. It was impossible not to feel sympathy with the views expressed by the noble Lord, in his desire to stop, at the outset, the formation of unsound societies, by obliging the tables to be properly certified by an actuary before the society was registered; but it was a very grave question how far legislation should be carried on those lines. Unfortunately, tables were not nearly so important as management. No one could deny for a moment that the failure of a friendly society, in which large numbers of the working classes might have for years contributed to make provision for themselves in old age and in sickness, was a calamity of a terrible and national character, and one against which every endeavour ought to be made to render it impossible. The great difficulty, however, was to what extent the State could interfere without producing a far greater amount of mischief in one direction than it produced good in another. The Government, after carefully considering the Bill, believed that the proposals it contained would be a retrograde step, would have a most disastrous effect of stopping the formation of registered societies, and would do far more harm than good. It had been found, by considerable experience, that the idea of having to obtain and work with approved Government actuarial tables completely stopped the formation of societies. It might be a sentimental idea, and it might be a foolish objection, but it was none the less true, that these societies got frightened either at the expense, or the possibility of a higher table being used than was necessary; and the simple result was either that they did not form them, or it drove them from becoming registered, and the State lost all control. In 1870, as their Lordships were aware, a very important Royal Commission sat on this subject, presided over by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Iddesleigh), and, in the course of four years, went very fully into the whole matter of friendly societies, and perhaps there was no greater authority on the question than the noble Earl. They made a great many recommendations, but they made no proposal such as the one now under consideration, as they saw it would not work, for they had before them the experience of the failure of previous legislation on the subject. In different shapes this enactment was in force from 1819 to 1834, and again from 1846 to 1850; but in both these periods the number of enrolments of societies fell off so considerably that an Act had to be passed to repeal the enactment. Mr. Tidd Pratt and Mr. Ansell both gave very strong evidence before Committees of the House of Commons, and showed that the number of applications fell off one-half. Although evidence on the subject of compulsory actuarial certification was received by the Commission, the matter was not even referred to in their Report; but instead of that they reported that the same object could be attained in a different way, and they proposed that every registered friendly society should be required to submit its affairs to valuation once, at least, in every five years as a better method. They expressed their opinion that periodical valuations were far more important than the original tables in these words—

"We attach even more importance to properly conducted periodical valuation, and to corrections made from time to time in the tables according to the results of those valuations than to the original tables themselves, and we consider that such valuations should be made compulsory upon all registered societies."

That proposal was carried into effect in the Act of 1876, and thus, practically, the very result desired by the noble Lord (Lord Greville) of getting proper tables was now the law of the land, only the mode of doing so was different. It was true that for the first few years, until the quinquennial valuation took place, the tables might be wrong; but that soon righted itself. Perhaps he might be allowed to quote the evidence on the subject of the Chief Registrar, Mr. Ludlow, who was examined last year before the Committee which was sitting in the other House on National Providence Insurance—

"You think the State ought not to interfere to help those people?—I do not think the State ought to compel registration, and I do not think it ought in any case to compel the acceptance of particular tables of contribution at starting. . . . The table of contributions when the society is started is nothing but a working hypothesis, and until it is tested by the experience of the society it is virtually of no value."

"Taking societies whose tables are not sound, must it not be certain, in the judgment of men like yourself, that these societies must end in mischief?—The only cases in which they must end in mischief are cases where they are worked by dishonest people, because societies have a wonderful power of recovering themselves when they seem to be very low if they have got the right sort of men."

"Supposing that such a table of contributions as we have been speaking of were laid down by the State, what mischief would accrue?—Very great mischief, because there would be an undue reliance placed upon it, and no good would arise. It is just the same thing as supposing that the community is to be made thoroughly healthy by requiring that everyone shall have a dietary prescribed for him by the doctor. The first question is will it suit the particular man, and the second question is whether, having received it, he will throw it out of the window."

The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Iddesleigh) would probably confirm him (Lord Sudeley) in saying that there were few greater authorities living than Mr. Ludlow. That gentleman had been Chief Registrar for 10 years, and before that was Secretary to the Royal Commission, and previously had made friendly societies one of the great studies of his life. His opinion was very strong that mismanagement was the real great difficulty. They might have the best possible tables, but they could not insure by their efficient control. Only the other day they had brought before them, in Mr. Lyulph Stanley's Report, the gross mismanagement of the Royal Liver Society, and yet they had the best tables based on actuarial valuations. There were also numerous actual failures recorded, where the tables had been quite sound. The United Assurance Society was one of these; and there had been several great collecting burial societies which had also failed, and yet they had all worked with certified tables from actuaries. It was quite possible, as alleged by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Norton), that the Government ought to have greater power to control and enforce proper regulations, and to see that there was honest management; but that was another question altogether, and was not contained in the proposal of the Bill before them. Further inquiry and investigation might be necessary; but he (Lord Suleley) maintained that in any case the Bill of the noble Lord was most inopportune at that moment. Grave doubts were even entertained whether the proposals of the Commission for a quinquennial valuation had not themselves gone too far. Even the Chief Registrar gave evidence to that effect. He said—

"The Act of 1875, which it is the fashion to call weak, is, in fact, too stringent for the great bulk of the population. The obligation to return a periodical valuation is one which, I believe, stands in the way—enormously in the way—of registration by the separate societies. The cost of valuation is a bugbear to a small society. This obligation to value is, I believe, very much dreaded by societies, and the consequence is that in an increasing proportion the new registers of separate societies which there have been are confined to such societies as are exempted from valuation. It is certain that the number of new individual societies of the ordinary class is much less at present than it was 10 years ago."

Whether that was the case or not, there could be no doubt that legislation on the subject of friendly societies was too important to be lightly dealt with, and without very full inquiry and examination. The Royal Commission showed that in 1875 there were, with wives and children, nearly 8,000,000 persons interested in the societies in England and Wales alone; and he believed the number was now, in 1886, close upon 10,000,000. The assets of these societies amounted to over £13,000,000, and the annual expenditure in benefits strictly was £3,000,000, which was thus annually saved to the ratepayers. That proved that it was of the utmost importance that no check should be put on the formation of friendly societies and of their becoming registered. In conclusion, he thought that he had shown that the principle of the Bill was ill-timed, and was condemned by experience, and by the highest authorities, and that a similar provision had actually to be repealed by statute in 1850. The Government, as he had said, had come to the conclusion that it would do more harm than good, and he trusted their Lordships would decline to give it a second reading.

THE EARL OF IDDESLEIGH said, he entirely shared with the noble Lord who had brought in the Bill (Lord Trevelyan), and his noble Friend near him (Lord Norton), the sentiments as to the great importance of this subject, and as to the great importance of doing everything that could be done to improve and to secure the system of insurance by the working classes. There could be no doubt that that was a matter of the very highest importance to the great body of the working classes of the country; but, at the same time, it was a matter full of difficulties, upon which it was necessary that they should proceed cautiously, warily, and, as far as possible, without giving any false impression to those for whose benefit they were acting, for there could be no doubt that the interposition of the Government, in any way, did produce a certain amount of erroneous impression that the Government was responsible for the management of the societies it allowed to be registered. At the time of the Royal Commission of 1870, the view taken by Mr. Lowe, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was that it would be better to do without registration altogether, in that it only led the working classes to believe that a security was given to them which was not really given to them. It was from a feeling that that was not the best way to treat the matter that the suggestion that a Royal Commission should issue arose. That Commission went very carefully into the matter, and came to the conclusion that it was not right to altogether throw the whole system loose and do without the Registrar; but that, at the same time, it was not right to take up such a position as would make the Government appear virtually responsible for what it could not be responsible. He did not believe that the mischief in connection with these societies arose so much from insufficient tables. He thought rather that the point to be looked at was the administration of the societies than their original tables. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Sudeley) had said nothing about that; but, in his (the Earl of Iddesleigh's) belief, it was a much more important point than that dealt with in the Bill. In the case of the Royal Liver Society the tables were perfectly correct. They had the highest authority, and no question was raised as to any insufficiency in the funds required to meet the obligations of the society. There were other causes involved, and the Bill of the noble Lord would not affect those causes the least in the world. While he thought that no language could be too strong to describe those who had been guilty of the practices exposed in the Report in the case of the Liver Society, the question before them was—should they, or should they not, make the Registrar responsible for the soundness of the tables? He thought it would be a very great mistake on the part of Government and of Parliament if they were to abandon the position taken up by the Commission of 1870, which was the foundation of the Act of 1875. He quite agreed that there were some things in the existing Act which might be carefully reviewed, and that it might be found possible to give greater powers to the Registrar to interfere earlier and more effectually than in the case of the Royal Liver Society; but he did not think it would be an easy matter. Those who had read the Report in that case would perceive that the real difficulty arose from the fact that the society was spread over a great part of England, and that the administration was conducted at headquarters. He hoped the Government would take such lessons as they could from the evidence given in that matter, and would see in what way their powers could be extended; but he also earnestly hoped they would not be carried away by such a matter into a course which had nothing to do with the evils complained of, and would expose them again to a very great difficulty. As to the Registrar himself, he wished to bear his testimony to his great merits. A harder working official could not, he believed, be found anywhere, and he could not believe that he had been in any way to blame, or that there had been any neglect of duty on his part. Whether the powers of that official should be increased was a matter for the Government to consider; but he did not see how anything of that kind could be introduced into the Bill. In the direction of direct Government action there was something to be done if the Post Office system could be improved. Under that system he believed something was really being done for the working classes in an unobjectionable and effective way. That was a matter to which the attention of the Government should be directed, and he hoped they would bear in mind as points upon which improvements might be made—first, the possibility of introducing stronger coercive measures for dealing with cases of abuse in the case of these great friendly societies when they arose; and, secondly, the possibility of improving and extending Government action by means of the Post Office system.

LORD GREVILLE said, he did not think a conclusive case had been set up against the Bill; but after what had been said by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Iddesleigh) he should not press it further by dividing the House.

Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE FOOD SUPPLY—SALE OF IMPORTED MEAT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they will take any steps to prevent the sale of imported meat as home produce, which entails great injury on the home producer as well as on the consumer? said, that in asking the Question he must not in any way be taken as objecting to the importation of meat. What he wished to prevent was the sale of imported meat as home produce. By prohibiting sales of that kind they would protect farmers and the public at large against gross frauds. If the Government would bring in a Bill to make the practice illegal, it would do much to benefit the poor in agricultural districts.

The Earl of Iddesleigh

LORD HOUGHTON for the Board of Trade, in reply, said, he fully recognized the desirability of securing that articles sold should actually be what they purported to be. Imported meat, however, was very similar to, or rather absolutely identical with, the home produce. That was especially true of meat that was not frozen. Anything, therefore, in the nature of the prohibition desired by the noble Lord opposite would be ineffective, as it would not be possible, even by analysis or otherwise, to distinguish between home produce and fresh imported meat, for there were often no means of discovering with any certainty as to where it had been produced. Indeed, he doubted whether any analyst, although able to detect the difference between oleomargarine and butter, could by any possible process be enabled to say whether a rump-steak came from an animal bred in Leicestershire, Holland, or Texas. If restrictions were placed on the importation of frozen meat, the Australian Colonies would be the chief sufferers, for they contributed by far the largest portion of frozen meat that came to this country. The United States, on the other hand, would benefit largely, for the quantity of fresh meat which they sent to us was immensely greater than their contribution of frozen meat; the change, therefore, would be likely to benefit the United States at the expense of the Colonies. In these circumstances, the Government did not see how they could take any steps in the direction indicated by the noble Lord.

NAVY—H.M.S. "COLLOSSUS"—THE 43-TON GUNS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH, in rising to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, 1. For what purpose the Colossus is to be sent to sea; 2. what trials or tests have the 43-ton guns of the Colossus been subjected to since the bursting of the Collingwood's 43-ton gun on 4th May last; and 3., what are the orders given to the officer appointed to the command of the Colossus with regard to the use or abstention from use of the ship's guns? said, a very great deal of interest had attached to the Colossus from the day when she was first designed. She was laid down exactly seven years ago, and therefore it could not be said that the Admiralty had shown any great precipitancy in sending the ship to sea. When she was designed by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby she was described as an improved Agamemnon, which, with the sister ship the Ajix, had already been described as small Inflexibles. The Colossus was 5 feet longer than the Inflexible, and her beam was 7 feet less. Her tonnage displacement was 2,000 tons less than that of the Inflexible. Her estimated cost was £500,000, and her actual cost £533,000. She was the first steel ship laid down at Portsmouth. She was one of the first three ships provided with steel-faced side armour—the other two being the Edinburgh and the Conqueror. She had two turrets, in which she carried four steel breech-loading guns, which were almost precisely similar to those of the Collingwood. She also carried five 6-inch guns, 10 Nordenfelts, and some Gardner and other quick-firing machine guns, and she was fitted with torpedo tubes and boats, so that, both in her offensive and defensive aspect, she was one of the most powerful iron-clads afloat. He wished to draw attention to the remarkable history of the 43-ton guns which she carried in her turrets. In 1882 the authorities at the Royal Arsenal recommended the abandonment of wrought iron in the construction of heavy ordnance for the Navy, and supplied a design for the construction of a steel breech-loading gun. With regard to those guns, he did not wish to decry the gun factory at Woolwich; but they could not shut their eyes to the fact that there were in this country men, composing the firm of Sir William Armstrong and Co., who for their long attention to the delicate construction of heavy ordnance were second to none in the world, and they had positively refused to manufacture guns upon the design of the 43-ton guns in question. It was somewhat remarkable, too, that their objections took two points. First, they objected to the construction of the gun itself; and, secondly, they objected to the mode in which it was proposed to manipulate and work the steel. He the Earl of Ravensworth was informed, upon indisputable authority, that steel for heavy rifled guns was best when it approached nearest to wrought iron, and that if it departed from the condition of "low" steel and was worked up to "high" steel it might be stronger, but it was more brittle. For gun manufacture the nearer it was kept to those qualities possessed by wrought iron the better. It was a remarkable circumstance that about the time that doubts arose both in regard to the design and the material of these 43-ton guns there were five in hand; but the authorities were not content with completing these—which, having regard to the money already spent upon them, was reasonable enough—but they ordered six other similar guns to be manufactured. These 43-ton guns were originally designed to carry a charge of 400 lbs. of powder. That was subsequently reduced to 290 lbs.; and even with this it was found that after 16 rounds they jammed, and the charge was then reduced to 222 lbs., which was the charge in the gun which burst on board the Collingwood. He should like to hear from the noble Marquess opposite the First Lord of the Admiralty what trials and what tests these guns had been submitted to since that lamentable accident. Of course, he did not deny that accidents to guns occurred in foreign Navies; but when an accident of this kind occurred on board an English ship it was bruited about all over the world; and what must be the effect on the minds of our foreign rivals and competitors in naval construction at hearing that one of our newest and most magnificent ships was being sent to sea with an embargo on her guns? What would be the effect on the gallant officers of that ship and her crew? He hoped that the noble Marquess would inform the House of the orders that had been given with regard to the use of the heavy guns of the Colossus. The noble Earl who preceded the noble Marquess at the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook) had, in the course of a debate in December, 1884, upon the Naval Programme, pointed out that it was not enough for us to follow in the wake of other nations. Having regard to the information and knowledge which we possessed as to the steps which were being taken by foreign nations to provide themselves with heavy ordnance, could the noble Marquess say that we were as much in advance of our rivals as we ought to be? If not, he hoped that no time would be lost in endeavouring to place ourselves in that position of pre-eminence which we ought to occupy.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (The Marquess of Ripon), in reply, said, the Colossus had been sent to sea for the purpose of testing her sea-going qualities, her armament, and her general qualities. For that purpose the Colossus would be sent on a summer cruise, which would take place shortly. The noble Earl was aware that there were other guns beside the 43-ton guns which were placed in the turrets of the Colossus; and there were, therefore, many parts of the ship's armament which required to be tested, and in regard to which it was desirable that trials should be made. It was hoped that in the course of the cruise of the Channel Fleet this year various experiments would be made with torpedo boats and with the torpedoes with which the ships were furnished, and in these respects it was desirable to ascertain the fighting qualities of the Colossus. It was for those reasons that the Board of Admiralty had thought it desirable to send this vessel to sea at once, and not to lose the summer, in order to make a thorough trial of her sea-going qualities. In regard to the 43-ton guns, he thought it was desirable that the public should clearly understand the question raised by the bursting of the gun. It applied only to a particular class of the 43-ton gun—namely, the 11 guns of which the noble Earl had spoken. The 43-ton guns which were now being manufactured, and which would be hereafter delivered to the Navy, were of an improved pattern, and were not, as the best authorities believed, liable to the objections urged against this particular class of gun. He should like to mention also that the 43-ton guns of the Colossus, although of the same description as those of the Collingwood, had passed through more trials than those of the Collingwood, and the result of those trials had been satisfactory. The guns of the Collingwood had only been tried at proof, and it was the opinion of many naval men that, in regard to these large guns, the particular danger arose especially in connection with the first round of fire after proof. Whether that was so or not he could not say; but that was the opinion held. Doubts had been thrown, and reasonably thrown, upon this particular class of 43-ton gun, in consequence of what happened the other day on the Collingwood. He (the Marquess of Ripon) and his Colleagues, immediately after the accident, communicated with the War Office, with the view of seeing whether these guns could not be replaced, for the noble Earl knew that the Admiralty was not responsible for the construction of these guns. The War Office was responsible; and it was only fair to the Board of Admiralty, who were concerned in this matter, that he should mention the fact. On inquiry, he ascertained that the War Office were making and would soon complete six 43-ton guns for land service, made upon an improved principle, and not liable to many of the objections which had been urged to the 43-ton guns, mark 2. He, therefore, went to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, and asked him to hand over those guns to the Navy. Looking at the circumstances of the case, his right hon. Friend at once agreed to do so. The guns, however, were made with trunnions, and would require to be altered. They would be taken in hand at once; and in three or four months, at the outside, he was informed that the whole of the six guns would be placed at the disposal of the Navy. Besides that he had already ordered two new guns of the very latest and best pattern. He had also under consideration whether the Admiralty should order some more of these guns, although they would not be completed for 12 or 14 months. He hoped, in consequence of the arrangement which he had been able to make with the War Office, that the Navy would receive six 43-ton guns of a satisfactory kind within a period of not more than four months. It was true that, in these circumstances, and looking to the fact that the Colossus was going to sea for the purpose of thoroughly testing her sea-going qualities, as a matter of precaution the Admiralty had directed the captain not to fire these 43-ton guns at target practice. He hoped, however, that soon after the cruise was finished those guns would be replaced by the other and more satisfactory guns to which he had referred. With reference to the Committee appointed to investigate the causes of the accident on the Collingwood, he had to mention that it was under the War Office. He made inquiry the other day as to the date of assembling and the probable period within which their Report would be presented; and he understood that the Committee would assemble in the course of the present week, and it was anticipated that the Report would be forthcoming in a fortnight or three weeks. When the Report was received it would be his duty, in communication with the Secretary of State for War, to consider it and the results arrived at, and to decide whether these showed the necessity of any further inquiry either in regard to those special guns, or, as was more likely, in regard to the large question of the mode in which the supply of guns to the Navy should be regulated.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, he wished to point out that guns of the size referred to were designed to fire a maximum charge of 100 lbs. of gunpowder. Guns of that calibre should be subjected to the full test for which they were designed before they were placed on board ship, as was done in France, otherwise officers and men would never trust these weapons. The noble Marquess had stated that it was the intention of the Admiralty to "chasehoop" these guns before firing them again; but he Viscount Sidmouth thought it likely that guns patched in that way would always be looked upon with distrust by the men. All these things showed how desirable it was that the Admiralty should have the entire control of the guns provided for the Naval Service. If you asked naval officers, you would find that 19 out of 20 were thoroughly dissatisfied with the present method of arming the Navy. The question was raised two years ago, when complaint was made of the way in which the manufacture was carried on; and it was stated, he believed, by the Marquess of Hartington, that we were behind other countries in manufacturing materials, and that the hammers we used were inferior to those in use in Germany. Yet we were now standing still, with no improvements effected, and ships were kept waiting seven or eight years for guns. In every instance in which a ship had been delayed, the delay had been attributed to the necessity of waiting for guns. We were now building five large ships, which would be absolutely useless, because the guns were not ready.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he fully appreciated the importance of efficiently testing guns before they were placed in the ships for which they were intended; but he did not think that either Admiralty or the War Office could have taken any better course than that which they had actually adopted, in having all the circumstances connected with the failure of the 43-ton gun in the Collingwood thoroughly investigated. He understood that, in the first instance, the Ordnance Committee was assisted by certain professional gentlemen quite unconnected with the Woolwich manufacturing departments. We were not the only nation that experienced failure in the manufacture of guns. Notwithstanding the great efficiency and the magnificent scale of the French Departments, it was not long ago, if statements in public journals were to be credited that at least two of the very largest of the French guns failed in proof at the chase, precisely in the same way our 43-ton gun had failed. These were two 70-ton guns, and the French Government had been obliged in consequence to alter their designs and patterns. Notwithstanding the magnificence of the establishments abroad, they had met with difficulties just as we had. It was well known that the most successful manufacturer of guns on the Continent, Herr Krupp, had produced several guns which had burst. Therefore, he hoped their Lordships would not suppose that such an accident as that which lately happened on board the Collingwood was to be looked upon as happening only to English guns. The French failures referred to were even more serious, because of the greater size of the guns. The main reason of their failures was the recent introduction of slow-burning powder. The effect of the firing of a charge was a pressure extending throughout the whole gun, instead of being confined to one portion, as it was before, with quick-burning powder. On that account we had been obliged to strengthen larger guns in the chase, so as to provide adequate resistance to the increased pressure resulting from the use of slow-burning powder. The peculiar construction which had caused the failure of the 43-ton gun on board the Collingwood had been avoided in the case of the 63-ton guns for ships of the Admiral class, which had been strengthened in the chase for the purpose of resisting the increased pressure. The still larger type of gun—the 110-ton gun—was designed in the same way. This gun, which was the largest to be placed on board ship, might be regarded with considerable confidence; and there was this additional ground for confidence—that guns of the same size had been supplied to the Italian Navy by the same manufacturer—namely, Sir William Armstrong and Co., who was constructing them for us, and they had been tested, and had stood the test successfully. So far as we could reasonably place confidence in any gun, we might place confidence in the 110-ton guns, not only because of theoretical improvements in their construction, but also because those guns had been tested by practical experience. As regarded the provision for guns for our ships, and the hydraulic machinery by which they were to be worked on board ship, we had no reason to fear comparison with the guns or machinery of other nations. As to the suggestion that the Board of Admiralty should undertake the construction of guns for the Navy, there was much to be said for and against the proposal. It was a very difficult question indeed. The course suggested might concentrate responsibility on the Department concerned; but it would involve the anomalous and undesirable state of things of a separate Department for the manufacture of naval guns and another Department for the manufacture of guns for the fortifications and the Army. An alternative plan which commended itself to his mind was that there should be a resuscitation of the old Ordnance Department, which should manufacture both for the Army and the Navy, and should be neither under the Secretary of State for War nor under the Board of Admiralty. It was possible that some arrangement of that kind might be an improvement upon their present system.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he wished to point out that a return to the old Ordnance Department would be going back 30 years. He thought it would be much more to the benefit of the country if the Government placed the whole of the manufacture of guns for both services under one Department, irrespective of the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty.

The Earl of Northbrook

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that this question turned not only on the inefficiency of British guns, but also on the efficiency of the guns of foreign Governments. At that moment there was in the House a noble and gallant Lord who was in a position to thoroughly compare the British guns with foreign guns, because he commanded the Combined Fleets at Dulcigno; and he (the Earl of Wemyss) was anxious to know if that noble and gallant Lord would tell the House what his own opinion was of the guns in those Fleets, and of their relative value? He the Earl of Wemyss had heard it stated that a Report was sent home to the effect that, with one exception, the British guns were worse than the others. It was rather remarkable that while the Italian ships carried 100-ton guns which did not burst, the Celestus, which was supposed to be the most powerful fighting ship created in modern times, could only carry 43-ton guns, one of which had burst, and with respect to the others orders had been given that they should not be fired. He did not know who was to blame; but that state of things was not satisfactory to the country, or complimentary to the Departments concerned.

LORD ALCESTER said, in reply to his noble Friend, that he had no recollection of sending home any Report of the kind mentioned by the noble Earl. Indeed, he was quite certain that he never made any such Report. He had seen a great deal of the foreign squadrons in the Mediterranean. At Dulcigno the French, the Austrian, the Russian, and the German ships carried breech-loading guns, while the English and Italian ships carried muzzle loaders, and in the comparison the English had nothing to fear. He was able to state that the British ships were not the only ships on which gun accidents occurred. He could mention two ships in the French Navy in which, through premature explosions, no less than five men were killed, and several others wounded.

NAVY—H.M.S.S. "NILE" AND "TRAFALGAR."

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Admiralty has decided to stop the progress of construction of the iron-clad ships Trafalgar and Nile; also, whether he can lay any information before the House as to the alleged structural defects of H.M.S. Calypso, and the failure of the machinery of H.M.S. Phaeton on her trial trip? It would, he said, be a great satisfaction to know whether it was the intention of the Admiralty to proceed with the Nile and Trafalgar, seeing that it was proposed by a Member of the House of Commons to strike them off the Estimates. He trusted that the noble Marquess and the Admiralty would not be led away by any suggestion to reduce the strength of the Navy in the iron-clad class, for it would, he thought, be a most unwise proceeding to stop the building of the two ships to which he had referred in the first part of his Question. Whatever the Admiralty might do, it was quite certain that other nations were pushing on and building powerful vessels. With regard to the other vessels named in the Question, he hoped the noble Marquess would be able to give satisfactory information, and that no person would be placed upon any inquiry who had been interested in the building of the vessels.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY The Marquess of Ripon, in reply said, that it was not the intention of the Board of Admiralty to make any change in their determination to proceed with the construction of the Nile and the Trafalgar. With regard to the defects of the Calypso, and the circumstances connected with them, there could be no doubt they existed, and they were being made the subject of a searching inquiry, and he should hesitate to express an opinion upon the matter while that inquiry was proceeding. The ship was built at Chatham, and the inquiry was being conducted by Admiral Codrington, the Director of Dockyards Mr. Elgar, and a gentleman connected with the Constructors' Department. The present Superintendent of Chatham Dockyard (Admiral Codrington) was not in office when the ship was building at Chatham. He was informed that the defects could be speedily remedied, and that the ship would be able to go to sea with the Training Squadron in the course of the month of June. He had received a Report as to the failure of the machinery on board the Phaeton; but since then the vessel had again been to sea, and no mention was made in the general Report, which he had received that day, of the engines; therefore, he presumed that they had worked all right. He had, however, called for a special Report.

BILL.—(No 127.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to order).

Clause 1 (A crofter shall not be removed except for breach of statutory conditions).

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving, as an Amendment, that the "Land Commission" be changed to "Crofters' Commission," said, that the Amendment was intended to meet the objection of the Land Commission of England, who said that they had functions in Scotland, and that unless a change in the title were made confusion would arise between the two Land Commissions.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 4, leave out ("Land") and insert ("Crofters.")—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Compensation to crofter for improvements on removal).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made:—At end, add—

"The provisions of the preceding section and of this section shall not apply to any holdings erected by a crofter or a cottar in violation of any interdict or other judicial order."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Appointment of three Commissioners).

On the Motion of The Duke of RICHMOND and GORDON, the following clause was inserted to follow:—

"The Crofters' Commission shall once in every year, after the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, make a Report to the Secretary for Scotland as to their proceedings under this Act, and every such Report shall be presented to Parliament."

Clause 32 (Saving in case of holdings in possession of servants).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment was inserted at end:—

The Marquess of Ripon

"Nor to any holding or building let at a nominal rent, or without rent, as a pension for former service, or on account of old age or poverty, nor to any holding or building let to a person during his tenure of any office, such as that of minister of religion or schoolmaster, nor to any innkeeper or tradesman placed in the district by the landlord for the benefit of the neighbourhood."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 33 (Definitions).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment added:—

"And shall also include, where not repugnant to the context, the heir or legatee succeeding to the tenancy of the holding."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN LONDONDERRY AND DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the Postmaster General, What is the additional amount of subsidy paid by the Post Office to the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland for the conveyance of the mails between Londonderry and Dublin, and vice versa, since the late acceleration of the mail service; whether, in consequence of the acceleration of such postal service, complaints have not reached him or his Predecessor with regard to the non-stoppage of the trains at stations on the Great Northern Railway of Ireland, to the great inconvenience of persons engaged in business at, or visiting, any such places; and, whether he cannot make such arrangements with the railway company as will reduce such inconvenience to a minimum, without interfering prejudicially with the efficiency of the mail service?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Lord WOLVERTON), in reply, said, that since April 1, 1885, the additional sum of £1,000 a-year had been paid to the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland for the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails, thus raising the total subsidy to £38,000 a-year. Applications had reached the Post Office for the stoppage of the mail trains at certain stations at which such trains did not now stop; but as such stoppages were not required for Post Office purposes, and as the applications could not be agreed to without diminishing the short interval for the preparation of replies by return of post now afforded to Londonderry, neither he nor his Predecessor could properly assent to the applications. He was quite willing to consider any proposal which the Railway Company might see fit to put before him with the object indicated by the noble Earl, provided that the expense of this service was not increased, and the public accommodation was not diminished.

BELFAST MAIN DRAINAGE BILL.

by Order.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration." — Sir James Corry.

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S.): I rise to move the insertion of the following new Clause:—

Part 12.—Municipal Franchise.

"And whereas it is expedient to alter the qualification of burgesses in the borough under the Act passed in the session of Parliament holden in the third and fourth years of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled 'An Act for the Regulation of Municipal Corporations in Ireland,' and to assimilate the same to the qualification of burgesses of the borough of Dublin and of boroughs in England and Scotland, and for such purposes to amend the provisions of the said recited Act so far as regards the borough of Belfast: Be it therefore Enacted, That, from and after the passing of this Act, so much of the thirtieth section of the said recited Act as requires that the house, warehouse, counting house, or shop therein referred to shall be of the yearly value of not less than ten pounds, shall be and the same is hereby repealed so far as regards the qualification of burgesses in said borough; and, for the purposes of such qualification, the said section shall be read and construed as if it were therein enacted that every man of full age who on the last day of August in any year shall be an inhabitant householder, and shall for six calendar months previous thereto have been resident as such within such borough or within seven statute miles of such borough, and who shall occupy within such borough any house, warehouse, counting house, or shop, shall, subject to the provisions in said section contained (save only the provision as regards the yearly value of said premises), if duly enrolled as therein, be a burgess of such borough and a member of the body corporate of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of such borough: Provided that a person occupying any such premises as aforesaid jointly with any other person or persons shall be deemed an occupier of such premises within the meaning of this and the said section. Nothing in this section contained shall affect any existing burgess roll, but from and after the passing of this Act all persons making out or revising any list or lists of burgesses or preparing any burgess roll, or doing any act in relation to same, shall have, and they are hereby required to have, regard to the provisions of this Act as regards the qualification of burgesses, as if such qualification had been prescribed in the Acts under which such lists are made out."

Sir, I hope very shortly to be able to convince the House that if this Bill is to pass at all the clause which I have to propose ought to be inserted in it. The House will perhaps remember that this is a Bill the chief purpose of which is to authorize the execution of a main drainage scheme for the important town of Belfast. The scheme came before a Committee of which I had the honour to be a Member, and it was estimated to cost about £200,000. The Committee, however, found that the scheme was incomplete, as it only proposed to provide a high level system of drainage; and they, therefore, imposed upon the Town Council of Belfast, who are the promoters, the condition that they should also execute a low level system, which is estimated to cost another £100,000. Considering how generally, in Belfast as well as in most other places, estimates are exceeded by the actual expenditure, it is not rash for me to assume that the execution of this scheme will require about £500,000 to carry it out. The public debt of Belfast at present amounts to £750,000, and the town of Belfast is charged with the payment of interest on that debt to the extent of £45,000 a-year. The execution of this scheme will add to that public debt a further sum, in the shape of annual interest, of £25,000, and it is calculated that that burden will last from the present time until about the end of the first decade of the 20th century. This being so, it is only natural to inquire what is the position of the municipal franchise in Belfast? Belfast, next to Dublin, is the most important town in Ireland, and there is no other town in Ireland, except Dublin, which can at all compare with it. It is a city which at present contains a population approaching 250,000. If Belfast was situated on this side of the Irish Sea, the municipal voters would number at least from 20,000 to 25,000; but, being on the other side of the Irish Channel, the municipal voters are only between 5,000 and 6,000 in number, and the municipal vote is so manipulated that a minority of 1,500 to 2,000 burgesses, finding they could obtain no influence in the municipal affairs of the town, and that they could not return a single Member to represent their opinions, have ceased to take any interest in municipal affairs, and the result is that the municipal affairs of the town, with a public debt of £750,000 and a payment of an annual interest of £45,000, has fallen into the hands of some 3,000 persons. Now, the Parliamentary Register contains the names of 32,000 electors; and thus, out of every 10 persons in Belfast who have a right to vote for the election of Members to this House, only one has the right to vote in the election of an ordinary Town Council. I submit that that is a state of things which should not be allowed to continue. There are special reasons in Belfast why the municipal franchise should be extended. Complaints have been made that the ratepayers and burgesses have not been consulted in regard to the present Bill, and public meetings have been held to protest against the conduct of the Town Council. On the other hand, there has been no public meeting in favour of the scheme; but I have already been intrusted with a Petition, signed by a considerable number of ratepayers of Belfast, protesting against the conduct of the Town Council, and inviting the House to reject the Bill unless the municipal franchise is extended to those who have to pay the taxation of the town. For the last 20 years the Corporation has consisted of a ring of persons representing a small fraction of the inhabitants, and they have taken care that the burden should lean lightly on the wealthy, while it is made to press heavily on the poor. Differential rates have been reduced, while uniform rates have been raised; and the consequence has been that the rates have become so high that within the last 20 years the rents of houses occupied by working men have been almost doubled. Belfast has lately, and is at the present moment, passing through a crisis of acute depression, and that is an additional reason why this scheme, involving the expenditure of £500,000, should not be passed until the men who have to bear the expenditure are given some share in the representation upon the Town Council. While the Corporation of Belfast has not been behind any Corporation in the Empire in the lavish expenditure of money in those parts of the town which concern the business or the comforts of the well-to-do, the paving and other arrangements of the town in the work-

men's quarters are a scandal to civilization. The streets which workmen, workwomen, and children have to pass along six times a-day are paved, not with flags, but with stones locally known as "petrified kidneys," which may have been of use to the mediæval pilgrim, but are not often seen nowadays in an important town. Offensive odours continually assert themselves in these districts; and I may say that the condition of this House, of which so much complaint has lately been made, is quite salubrious compared with the working men's quarters of Belfast. I maintain that these are reasons why the working men of Belfast should have some voice in this main drainage scheme before it is carried out. If they are not allowed to have a voice in it, it is not likely to be carried out for their benefit. The position of this municipal franchise question is a peculiar one. In several Sessions of the last Parliament this House passed a Municipal Franchise Bill for all the boroughs of Ireland. It was agreed to extend to every borough in Ireland what I am now asking for in connection with the borough of Belfast. But what was the result? The House of Lords on every occasion threw out the measure; and, therefore, when I am told that it is unusual and inconvenient to introduce a measure of public law into a Private Bill, my reply is that when the wish of this House, in respect of the Irish municipal franchise, is defeated year after year by the action of the House of Lords, this House is not only entitled, but bound, to seize every opportunity which may offer itself to make its will effectual. Since I first moved in this matter, in the early part of the Session, this question has been somewhat advanced, because the new Parliament has adopted the second reading of the Irish Municipal Franchise Bill. By so doing it has affirmed the principle I seek to enforce; but of what use is it to pass that Bill here? What assurance can we have that the Bill would be passed into law? The assurances are all the other way. The probability is that the Bill this year, as in former years, will be rejected in "another place;" and I therefore invite the House, as a matter of self-respect, and in the assertion of its own judgment, to take the opportunity afforded by the presentation of this Private Bill to show that they have a real regard for the interests of the poor ratepayers of Belfast. Early in the Session the second reading of this Private Bill was taken by surprise. The Bill was read a second time on the first day after the Recess, caused by the change of Government, and it was taken at a time when the Irish Members had no idea that it was intended to take that stage. It was taken, in point of fact, at a time when the Irish Members had not returned to this House. I subsequently moved an Instruction, the object of which was to extend the boundaries of Belfast in accordance with the recommendations of a Royal Commission, which reported, some time ago, on the redistribution of boundaries. The hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) objected to that part of the inquiry, because it might involve a lengthened investigation and detailed arrangements; but I maintain that that was no reason why it should not be done. I have now got rid of that part of my former Motion, and I now make the simple request that the municipal franchise, which for four years past has prevailed in the boroughs of England and Scotland, and for the past generation has prevailed in the City of Dublin, should be also extended to Belfast. The House, since I moved my Instruction, has recognized the principle that the wishes of the Irish Members should be respected in matters of Private Bill legislation in connection with Ireland. Only a short time ago the House rejected the third reading of the Dundalk Gas Bill, because the measure was opposed by the majority of the Irish Members; and it is that manifestation of feeling on the part of the House which relieves us of the necessity of making at this time a more determined stand against the whole of the absurd system of Private Bill legislation for Ireland. When I moved my Instruction on a former occasion, the Chairman of Committees objected to part of it, on the ground that it involved a large measure of public policy; and I find it now asserted in one of the reasons put forward by the supporters of the Bill for the rejection of my Resolution, that it is an attempt to make use of a stage of a Private Bill to open up a large question of public policy. Now, this involves no new assertion of public policy. The hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees urged on the former occasion that it was unusual and inconvenient to deal with a measure of public law in a Private Bill. But the hon. Member was confronted in that debate by many cases to the contrary. I have looked into the subject since, and I find that, so far is it from being unusual to incorporate the public law in a Private Bill, that it has been the usage and rule. In the Local Acts for Black Rock, Clontarf, Kilmainham, Kingstown, Pembroke, Rathmines, Bray, and Galway measures of public law were incorporated. In addition to these particular cases the Commissioners Clauses Act of 1847, which is an Act

"for consolidating in one Act certain provisions usually contained in Acts with respect of the constitution and regulation of bodies of Commissioners, for the purpose of facilitating their incorporation in special Acts both public and private, and insuring uniformity," contains a series of clauses dealing with the franchise on which Commissioners are elected, and these clauses must have been incorporated in dozens of English Local Acts. The House will be astonished, after the argument of the Chairman of Committees, to hear that up to the year 1847, when that Act was passed, these provisions of public law were usually inserted in all Private Bills relating to the government of municipal towns. I have looked into the Local Acts in question, and I find that they contain, not merely provisions of public law, but actually whole public statutes; and if these things may be done by the promoters of Private Bills, and by Select Committees, why should they not be done by the authority of the House itself? On the day before the day fixed for considering my Instruction, a meeting of the Corporation of Belfast was held, and a motion was made in support of my Instruction. That motion was encountered, not by an amendment on its merits, nor by a direct negative, but by moving the previous question. After the motion in favour of my Instruction had been defeated in that way by the Corporation of Belfast, the Town Clerk posted in hot haste to London, and The Belfast News Letter trumpeted the fact in the columns of that newspaper. In accordance with the example set by the Corporation of Belfast the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees moved the Previous Question in this House.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES: Allow me to say that I had not heard of the act of the Belfast Corporation.

MR. SEXTON: The coincidence, nevertheless, was very curious. A meeting of the Corporation of Belfast was held on Saturday last to consider the subject of the present Motion, and upon its conclusion the Town Clerk left again for London. That remarkable official, who enjoys a salary of £2,750 a-year, and who has the honour to hold a roving commission from the Corporation of Belfast, is now in London for the purpose of communicating his views and ideas to the Chairman of Committees. A correspondent writes to me as follows:—

"The Town Clerk left here last evening for London to obtain all the Parliamentary influence he could to defeat your forthcoming Motion. The Committee were not unanimous in passing the resolution. The Town Clerk says that Lord Arthur Hill has issued a four-line Whip to obtain the rejection of your Motion; and I am also told that the Clerk will use his influence with Mr. Courtney to obtain some Liberals."

In these days even a four-line Whip by the Tory Party has ceased to be a formidable weapon; and I do not think that the supporters of the measure are likely to obtain the advocacy of any Liberal Members except the Chairman of Committees. The House, however, usually agrees with the suggestions of the Chairman of Committees as to Private Bills. No doubt, the House respects the position which the hon. Gentleman holds, and is anxious that it should be respected; but I am afraid that if the language and action of the Town Clerk of Belfast were brought under your notice, Sir, as a matter of privilege, that gentleman might find himself standing at the Bar of this House before he returned to Belfast. On the 14th of July last the Rathmines Bill, which had come down from the House of Lords, was considered in this House, and upon that occasion the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) moved an Amendment analogous to the Resolution which I am now moving. The right hon. Baronet said—

"As one of the Members of the Royal Commission, over which, indeed, he had had the honour to preside, he had become acquainted, through the evidence adduced before it, with the pressing character of the evils which now existed in Ireland with regard to municipal representation, and of the necessity which existed for a reduction in the borough franchise."

The right hon. Baronet added that—

"The evidence of witness after witness given before the Commission—and he was bound to say that it was most uniform evidence—the evidence of witnesses belonging to every political Party from all parts of Ireland was of the strongest possible kind as to the effect of the very high franchise which at present existed in the Irish townships. The statement which was heard everywhere was that the franchise was limited to a certain class of people, by whom the representatives returned to the Irish municipalities were only capable of being elected. The effect in regard to the Town Commissionerships was to place the entire power, so far as election and administration was concerned, in the hands of a small ring of persons, upon whom the general public opinion of the locality could have no bearing whatever. The result of that was seen in the extreme difficulty which there was of securing a proper administration of the Sanitary Laws in the Irish townships, and in the fact that the death-rate in the Irish towns was threefold that of the rural districts in Ireland."—(3 Hansard, [299] 636-7.)

The Motion of the right hon. Baronet was opposed only by two Members, both of whom were Members for the county of Dublin, and the only reason they gave for their opposition was the lateness of the period of the Session and the fact that the Bill had yet to go back to the House of Lords. That reason does not apply in the present case, as there is abundant time for the consideration of the Bill; and we have the further fact that the two hon. Members who opposed the Bill were neither of them returned for the county of Dublin at the last General Election. One of them—the hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet Division of the county of Kent (Colonel King-Harman—was obliged to seek for a seat in England, and the other—Mr. Ion Trant Hamilton, who again contested the representation of the county of Dublin—was defeated by my hon. Friend who now sits for the Southern Division. Sir Thomas Esmonde, Sir Arthur Otway, who then held the position of Chairman of Committees, took part in the debate, and said that—

"Having given a great deal of consideration to this matter after the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the late President of the Local Government Board had been brought under his notice, he had come to the conclusion that it would not be proper to retain the franchise under which these Commissioners were elected. He was, therefore, prepared to advise the House to consent to the Amendment of his right hon. Friend. . . . When he looked into the matter he came to the conclusion that, under the circumstances in which they were living, with the changes that were constantly taking place, although this franchise had been in existence so far back as the year 1847, it was, nevertheless, of so restricted a character that it ought no longer to be retained for any township. He therefore supported the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, and advised the House to assent to it."—(Ibid. 650-1.)

I would strongly recommend to the right hon. Gentleman the present Chairman of Committees the example of his Predecessor in the Office he holds. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said, further, in moving his Amendment upon the Rathmines Bill—

"The most likely objection he could foresee was this—'We admit that it is probable it may be desirable to reduce the borough franchise in Ireland, or the franchise for the election of Town Commissioners, and, indeed, all the local franchises in Ireland. But, although we admit that, we should not be prepared to reduce the franchise in the case of the first Private Bill which comes before the House this Session in which the question is raised.' He had considered that objection, believing that it might probably be taken to his present action. Of course, it might have some weight with the House, and some hon. Members might be persuaded by that view to refuse to alter the franchise in an exceptional case. He therefore felt fully the responsibility of the course he was taking, but, in the face of all the facts which had come to his knowledge, he felt that he could not be a party to the continuance of the present high franchise."—(Ibid. 649.)

The right hon. Baronet moved his Amendment with a full knowledge of the objection which has since been taken by the Chairman of Committees, and yet the right hon. Baronet persevered with his Motion, and obtained the assent of the House to it. Further than that, the then Chairman of Committees Sir Arthur Otway, although he entertained a high sense of the value of the scheme proposed to be carried out in the Rathmines Bill, was, nevertheless, prepared to accept the Amendment, even if, by so doing, he risked the loss of the Bill. Now, if that reform was of importance to Rathmines, it is indispensable to Belfast. Rathmines is simply a suburb of Dublin, where the houses are of such a description that almost the whole of the occupiers have votes; whereas in Belfast it is felt by the working men that there is not the slightest prospect of their obtaining any control over the expenditure connected with the municipal affairs of the town unless my Amendment is adopted. I have been furnished with a Statement of Reasons on behalf of the Corporation of Belfast in opposition to my Motion, and it is said that the change ought not to be made except with adequate discussion. Now, for how many Sessions has this House been engaged in discussing the matter, and what is the use of wasting our time in further discussion, when we know that a radical change must be made in the Government of Ireland before any reasonable reform will be adopted by the House of Lords? This Paper says that the Resolution—

“Emanates from a Gentleman representing a remote constituency in Ireland, having no concern with the borough of Belfast either as a resident or ratepayer.”

But this Amendment emanates from 85 out of 100 Irish constituencies, and I wonder at the taste of the gentlemen who put this reason forward, when they know very well that, at the last election for that borough, I obtained more votes than two of the gentlemen who are actually sitting for the borough. The Statement goes on to say—

“There is no evidence of any desire on the part of the inhabitants and ratepayers for any such change as is proposed being effected by the present Bill, while all the Members for the new constituencies of Belfast are opposed to dealing with the municipal franchise in an exceptional manner.”

It is said that this question was not raised at the last municipal election for Belfast. Why should it have been raised there? The municipal elections in Belfast are controlled by a very narrow body of persons who have never shown themselves eager to extend the municipal franchise. What is far more important than the fact that the question was not raised at the last municipal election is the fact that it was raised at the Parliamentary Election, and two of the hon. Gentlemen now sitting above the Gangway presented themselves to the electors as municipal reformers, who adopted the principle I am now seeking to enforce. They were elected upon that principle, and upon that principle alone they succeeded in defeating Sir James Corry and Dr. Seeds—the regular candidates adopted by the Tory Party. The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), early in the Session, introduced a Bill for the extension of the municipal franchise in Ireland; but the

hon. Member, from some inscrutable reason, has moved the discharge of the Order. The hon. Member has an unfortunate habit of saying one thing in Ireland and doing another in this House; but considering that my Motion, if carried, will effect the object he has in view, I venture to hope that I may promise myself the honour of his support. The promoters of the Bill go on to state in their reasons—

“The present position of the Corporation of Belfast and its municipal affairs will be generally known to Members of the House as comparing favourably with that of any other town in Ireland; and the Corporation of Belfast, and the important commercial and mercantile classes of that town, would probably prefer to continue subject to the existing difficulties in regard to the pollution of the River Lagan and the sewerage of the town, rather than that the municipal arrangements should be revolutionized in the manner and to the extent now proposed. The proposal is, in fact, an attack from outside on the town of Belfast, and the Corporation would not feel justified in making such a sweeping change without a distinct expression of opinion in its favour from the inhabitants generally.”

Yes, Sir, this ring which at present controls the government of Belfast, and the expenditure of £200,000 a-year, would rather have the death-rate of the town influenced by the present condition of the sewage, and the inhabitants be liable to pestilence, than that the ratepayers generally should be admitted to a share in the government of the town. If that does not satisfy the House of the spirit by which the Corporation of Belfast are actuated and their moral incompetence to continue the performance of their functions, I cannot imagine what argument will. My Motion is supported by five-sixths of the Members from Ireland; it is sure to be supported by the Members of the Liberal Party who have affirmed over and over again the principle I seek to carry out; and I shall be greatly surprised if the Motion is opposed by the Party above the Gangway who arrogate to themselves the position, in an inclusive sense, of being the champions of the Protestants of Ireland. Sir, I beg to move the insertion of the clause which stands upon the Paper in my name.

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn): Although a Tory, I rise to second the Motion of the hon. Member; and I rise perfectly independent of my brother Conservative Members. I am acting purely of my own free will; but I think that, although I approach the question from a very different standpoint from the hon. Member who has just sat down, I am right in saying that he has adopted a correct view of the matter, and that in carrying this Motion we should do something to place the Irish municipal franchise and local government in Ireland upon that footing of equality with local government in other parts of Great Britain on which it ought to stand. I confess that I differ very much from hon. Members who sit below the Gangway on that question of Home Rule which is so dear to them; but I have always recognized the propriety of stimulating the action of the Government in taking steps to remodel the existing municipal system throughout the United Kingdom. On more than one occasion when I have at first felt opinions strongly opposed to the views of the Irish Members on some matters, I have been convinced by their arguments, and I have found myself in the same lobby with them. I am prepared to admit that there is a certain amount of eccentricity, and it may be inconvenience, in tacking on a general principle to a clause of a Private Bill; but if there is no other way of carrying the point, I am not going to quarrel with it. If I had any doubts as to the course I ought to take on this subject, those doubts would have been removed by the paper which has been circulated among Members this morning by the promoters of the Bill. That paper is very contradictory in its terms, as I hope presently to show. During the late Election I was one of the many Conservative candidates opposed to Home Rule; but I always expressed a readiness to give to the Irish people precisely the same advantages which are given to the English and Scotch people; and I desire to remove all those differential hardships which are supposed to exist in the Sister Kingdom. I have no desire to go back from my words now; and I think the hon. Member has proved satisfactorily that in this particular instance a grievance does exist in Belfast. As a Tory, I have an idea that, in politics as in surgery, when a sore is discovered the best thing is to eliminate it, and that there is no advantage in concealing it, denying it, or maintaining it. I have no doubt that a of Belfast in not being allowed to exercise the franchise, although they are required to contribute to the rates. It seems to me preposterous to give the Parliamentary franchise to these people and to deny them the municipal franchise. I have always looked upon the exercise of the municipal franchise, in relation to the Parliamentary franchise, as something like a primary school distinguished from the secondary school. If we desire that those upon whom we have conferred the Parliamentary franchise should exercise it well, why deny to them the education which will undoubtedly be given to the people by the possession of the municipal franchise? In this document we are told that there is already a Bill before the House covering the whole general question—namely, the Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill—and that it has passed through certain stages. I can only say that if the effect of the Motion which has just been moved will be to stir up the Government and hurry through that Bill I shall be delighted, and I am certain that in that case this Resolution might be withdrawn. But we are reminded of the now classical expression, “that the sands are dropping through the hour-glass,” and unless the Government are almost omnipotent it will be difficult to pass many of the Bills which we now have before the House. We are told that the admission of so many ratepayers of Belfast to the franchise is viewed with something like horror by the promoters of this Bill, and, therefore, the support of those gentlemen would not be likely to be given to the Municipal Franchise Bill which has been referred to. For my part, I look upon this Resolution as a very mild one, indeed, after the discussions we have had during the past half-century in favour of municipal reform. Why should we refuse to grant the municipal franchise in Ireland as in England? The valley of Parliamentary debate for the last 50 years is strewn with the dry bones of arguments against extension, and there is no intellectual magician in the House who can stir those dead bones into life? Therefore, I think it is absolutely a waste of time in this House to raise up the question of the franchise again, and also a great waste of energy, however honest Members may be in wishing to discuss the question. In the present case a large number of those who contribute to the rates have no power to participate in the municipal government under which they live. We have given to the people the power of exercising the political franchise, and surely it would be wise to instruct them how to exercise that power beneficially which we have so given to them. What is the use of giving a sword to a man and refusing to teach him how to use it lest it may be used against those who give it? It should be remembered that, in the end, if the man who has the sword directs it against the man who has given it, he may inflict clumsy wounds, because he has not been taught, but his arm will be nerved by a sense of anger at not being trusted. When we have once decided upon arming the people and conferring power upon them, we ought to witness with pleasure their skill in using the weapon with which we have armed them. I can quite understand that Parliament may refuse to give it if it thought it right to refuse; but, having once given it, I do not understand why we should do anything to minimize the value of the gift. Let us trust all in all, or not at all. We want to see in this country all classes working together; and I think it would be much better if we were to show in this House that we are anxious to see the people upon whom we have conferred the franchise exercise it beneficially by intrusting them also with the municipal franchise, rather than by imposing little barriers here and there. I feel, as a Conservative, that the barriers which now exist between class and class, created simply by the possession of wealth and education, or by circumstance, are things which a child's foot might kick away, and that they will do no harm unless they are cemented with the hardening mortar of a sense of injustice. Let us do away with every idea of injustice which may have been introduced into the minds of those to whom we have just given political power. I am quite sure that if we had carried out more of this principle in the past the cry for Home Rule would not have become so accentuated as it now is. Let us now try to be just and endeavour to trust the people. It is perhaps an eccentric mode of dealing with the subject to insert a principle of general law into a Private

Colonel Duncan

Bill; but unless something is done to arrest the proposed expenditure of public money in Belfast, however desirable that expenditure may be, until the people feel that they have their full share in controlling the expenditure, we shall only intensify the feeling of injustice which now prevails. I am not one of those who believe that the interests of the small ratepayers are hostile to those of the large ratepayers. On the contrary, I believe that the interests of both are absolutely identical. People are rated according to their means, and if a man is guilty of encouraging municipal extravagance he soon finds that it recoils upon himself, and that the small and large ratepayers suffer in equal proportion. As we have done so much in conferring Parliamentary power upon the people, let us do a little more; and although we view these matters from a very different point of view, I hope it will be admitted that we can even discuss Irish local affairs and Irish local administration effectively. Perhaps the hon. Member who has just moved this Resolution thinks and hopes for something very different from what I do. I dare say he believes that if this Motion is rejected, he will be justified in maintaining that another argument has been forged for him to use both here and in Ireland as to the impossibility of obtaining justice for Ireland in this House. Now, I feel that Irishmen do know a great deal in regard to what they want; that they are not people to be legislated for, but that they have a right to legislate in their local affairs for themselves; and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will give some assurance that the general question of the municipal franchise in that country will be pushed forward, I hope that the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) will withdraw the Motion. ["No!"] If such an assurance as that is not given, I can only say that, having studied the question on both sides, I shall undoubtedly feel it my duty, as a Tory, to go into the Lobby with the hon. Gentleman.

New Clause (Part 12.—Municipal Franchise, —brought up, and read the first time.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne) : I must congratulate the hon. and gallant Member who has just spoken upon having made a most eloquent exposition of sound Radical doctrine. And I think the whole spirit of his remarks, when he comes to make, as we all hope he will, a speech upon another Bill that is before the House, should be to the same effect as that which has now animated him. [Colonel DUNN dissenting.] The hon. and gallant Member shakes his head; but I do not see why he should limit the principles he has so forcibly laid down to the Bill now before the House. The hon. and gallant Member has thrown out a suggestion which has already occurred to my own mind as the proper and best way of meeting the views of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. SEXTON). Upon the merits of the hon. Member's Amendment we are most of us on this side of the House absolutely at one with the hon. Gentleman. It is impossible to defend a state of things under which some 4,000 or 5,000 persons decide questions which, if Belfast were an English constituency, would be decided by 25,000 or 30,000. That is a state of things which cannot be defended politically, and it produces a vast number of exceedingly evil social results. I remember a discussion on the Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill in the earlier part of this Session, in which I reminded the House that the death-rate in Ireland was lower than the death-rate in England, while the death-rate in the Irish boroughs is higher than in the English boroughs. One very reasonable explanation of that is to be found in the fact that in the English boroughs the population have a very large influence on the regulation of the affairs of the town, whereas in Ireland this regulation is confined to a very small oligarchy of the people. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. SEXTON) at once saw the changed aspect put upon his Amendment since he moved his Instruction much earlier in the Session concerning the Bill to a Select Committee. Since that time the House has read a second time a Public Bill extending to the Irish boroughs the same rights in regard to the municipal franchise as those maintained in the English boroughs. That being the case, it seems to me that it would be particularly undesirable and equivocal to admit the extension of the franchise to the borough of Belfast by a side wind when the House has already affirmed the principle of the propriety of that extension, not only in reference to Belfast, but in regard to all the boroughs in Ireland. Now, what we propose is that we should give facilities for taking up the Bill relating to the extension of the municipal franchise in Ireland at such an hour that it would evade a block. The hon. Gentleman said that very likely the same fate would await the Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill "elsewhere" as has affected proposals of the same kind in other years. I do not know how that may be, but I may remind the hon. Member that whatever the direction of probability may be, it is equally probable that the same decision may be applied to this Bill when it reaches "another place" if it contains a clause in the sense of the hon. Member's Amendment. Either the whole Bill or the clause may share the same fate which he apprehends for the Municipal Franchise Bill. (Mr. SEXTON: Let the Bill wait.) The hon. Member says— "Let the Bill wait." I should have thought that in taking up that position the hon. Member was placing himself exactly in the position which he reproaches the promoters of the Bill for taking up in the Circular which they have issued to Members of this House—a position which, I am bound to say, seems to me not only astonishing but most indefensible. The Corporation say—

"The present position of the Corporation of Belfast and its financial affairs will be generally known to Members of the House as comparing favourably with that of any other town in Ireland, and the Corporation of Belfast, and the important commercial and mercantile classes of that town, would probably prefer to continue to carry out the existing scheme in regard to the pollution of the River Lagan and the sewerage of the town, rather than that the municipal authorities should be empowered in the near future to extend now proposed. The Corporation do not desire to attract outside capital to Belfast, and the Corporation would not be justified in extending such a sweeping franchise with a view to the extension of capital to the town from the outside generally."

That is the position which the hon. Gentleman himself is now ready to take up. (Mr. SEXTON: No.) I cannot distinguish between that position and the one occupied by the promoters of the Bill. It is to my mind a position that is most indefensible.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to explain? I say that the Corporation of Belfast should give up the scheme until they can give the ratepayers an opportunity of expressing their opinion with regard to it. I say that the scheme should be postponed until the ratepayers are admitted to power.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: In either case the ratepayers of Belfast will continue to be poisoned by bad drainage. Now, Sir, I will not argue the matter further, but will say that we make the offer in perfect good faith, believing that the passage of the Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill will be a very great boon to the Irish boroughs. We see, therefore, no reason why the hon. Member and his Friends should not accept the broader position we offer them, instead of the narrow one that they now hold.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I think the right hon. Gentleman somewhat misapprehends our position. A Circular, in the form of a threat, conveying some sort of intimation that the Bill will be lost if this Amendment is added, has been issued by the promoters. I would, however, remind the House that exactly the same intimation was conveyed last year to us by the promoters of the Rathmines Bill before the Amendment which was proposed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was added to the Bill. It was said then, as it is threatened now—"We will abandon the Bill if you insert that clause." An hon. and gallant Member who then represented the county of Dublin, but who now represents the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman), and Mr. Ion Trant Hamilton, who also represented the county of Dublin, but who is no longer a Member of this House, said—"If you insert this clause the promoters will be inclined to drop the Bill. The House of Lords will throw it out." Well, the House of Lords did not throw it out. The House of Lords were friendly to these gentlemen, and they surrendered upon that Bill, as they will have to do upon this. The promoters having spent hundreds, and, perhaps, thousands, of pounds on the Bill, will not be inclined to waste all that money if they know that the House of Commons will insist upon this Amendment. The House of Commons has a grip on the House of Lords in regard to Private Bills which I wish they had as regards Public Bills. It is, however, a novel and an exceptional position. In respect to Private Bills we have got the House of Lords in a vice, for this reason—that the promoters are on terms of friendship with many of them. They have invested money in the promotion of the Bill, and they will not be content to let it drop. I therefore invite the House of Commons to insist upon the Amendment. I have to tell the right hon. Gentleman that his proposal to give us a day for discussing the Bill will not meet the case at all, for this reason—it would meet the same opposition as this clause from Gentlemen who are all of one view. Let us take this Bill as a hostage until the House of Lords have passed the Franchise Bill. Let us have an adjournment of this debate, and postpone the Belfast Drainage Bill until the other has passed. Is it nothing that £500,000 is proposed to be spent by a little narrow ring in Belfast who were signally defeated during the last Parliamentary Election, by the return of the hon. Members for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) and East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain)? Everything at the last Election turned upon this question, and it resulted in the defeat of the former Member (Sir James Corry), who was beaten in his own town on this very question, and who is now Member for Mid Armagh. One of the Gentlemen who won a seat as an Orange Democrat was the dismissed cashier of the Corporation. He was dismissed by the Corporation because he had opposed their candidate, Sir James Corry, who received a Baronetcy for his services to the Tory Government. We are told that we want to injure Belfast—we are told we want to restrict its liberties—but here, Sir, when we are attempting to extend and amplify the liberties of Ulster, we are opposed by the Tory Party, who say we want to restrict them. I have said that it is an immense amount of money that this Corporation propose to expend—an expenditure amounting to £500,000 sterling—and all we say is, that every capable citizen in Belfast ought to be allowed to have a voice in the matter. It is said that if you delay the Bill the people of Belfast will be poisoned; but they have been poisoned for 20 years. The death-rate has still, however, not yet arrived at any extraordinary high figure. We in this House are also being poisoned. We have been poisoned more or less for 20 years, and are none the worse for it. I therefore think that such arguments are wholly irrelevant. I trust the House will adhere firmly to the principle we have laid down, and until the House of Lords passes the larger Bill, it is our duty to insist that this Bill should go up to the House of Lords with a Franchise Clause inserted in it.

MR. HASLETT (Belfast, W.): We have had a number of instances quoted, but no good authority has been given for inserting a clause of this class in a Private Bill promoted for an entirely different object. The instance of the Rathmines Bill has been quoted as a precedent for the course now proposed to be taken; but the Rathmines Bill, not only in its clauses, but actually in its advertisement, contained statements covering the question of franchise, through which the public were made acquainted with all the purposes of the Bill. I think it would be inopportune to accept such a clause as is now proposed, seeing that the entire subject is one upon which legislation is pending. The Rathmines Bill, besides being a Private Bill, related to certain districts outside Dublin—MR. SEXTON: This is a Private Bill. (A laugh.) I am quite aware that this is a Private Bill. If the hon. Gentleman would wait until he heard the remainder of my sentence, he would probably find that the laugh might be turned against him. My argument is, that while this is a Private Bill, and the Rathmines Bill was also a Private Bill yet, in connection with the latter Bill, public Notice was given of the contemplated Amendment. My contention is, that due Notice ought to be given of any intention to change the character of the Governing Body. That was done in regard to the Rathmines Bill, but it is wanting here; and, therefore, the analogy is entirely fallacious. On the last occasion when the Bill was before the House, and we were asked to pass a similar but somewhat larger Resolution, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a very clear manner, pointed out the great inconvenience which would arise if questions of public policy were introduced into these Private Bills; and I now commend that consideration to the House. I am bound to say that, for the convenience of the House, no wiser or clearer principle could be laid down than that which was laid down on that occasion, both by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chairman of Committees. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), with an evident intention of catching the votes of hon. Members through the principle he puts forward, asks the House to pass his clause, with a view to equalize the franchise in the various Irish boroughs to that which exists in England and Scotland, and even in Dublin. But the hon. Member does not inform the House that his clause would not accomplish that object, and he keeps back the information that in not one solitary instance he has spoken of would there be an assimilation of franchise. The proposed clause would give the franchise to "every occupier" and to "every joint occupier of a house" under the old system. We might have, I suppose, 30 men occupying one house, and though only paying 1s. a-week rent each, they would all be capable of exercising the municipal franchise. The hon. Member asks, moreover, to give the franchise for six months' occupation, while Dublin requires three years' occupation.

MR. T. M. HEALY Londonderry, S.: No, no. That is repealed. It is not so now.

MR. HASLETT: I am aware it is said to be partly repealed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is absolutely repealed.

MR. HASLETT: Only partially repealed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No: absolutely.

MR. HASLETT: The qualification in England is 12 months' occupation. In regard to Scotland, I cannot say what it is, because it varies in different boroughs, and yet we are asked to pass a clause to extend the franchise, and to assimilate it to the franchise in other boroughs, when, as a matter of fact, it is almost impossible to find throughout the whole of Ireland a parallel case. Is it unreasonable, therefore, that we should ask that great public issues of this kind should be decided by Public Acts of Parliament, and not by a Private Bill which can apply to one town only? The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) dwelt very strongly upon £500,000 being required to carry out this scheme, notwithstanding the fact that, as a Member of the Committee, he had sworn testimony before him from a respectable constructor of sewers, who has done an immense amount of work of that kind even in Dublin, that he was prepared to carry out the works in Belfast for the sum named in the Bill. Yet the hon. Member, in defiance of that testimony given before himself as a Member of the Committee, said that it would cost double that sum, and would throw great hardship upon the town to meet it. The entire taxation in one year under this Bill cannot exceed £15,000, of which the larger ratepayers who now possess the franchise will contribute £12,000. There has been a distinct expression of opinion from these larger ratepayers of the borough on this very question of drainage. Then, again, we are asked to consider this Bill, which relates to Belfast only, in conjunction with an Act which has been passed for Rathmines. I do not know how the Rathmines Act was procured. I only know that the clause relating to the franchise, which was inserted in it by this House, simply altered the amount of the franchise. That alteration was previously notified to the public, who had full opportunity of expressing their opinions upon it; but a similar course has not been adopted in regard to this Bill. For once I agree, and I am glad to do so, with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that a question of this kind is much better dealt with on a broad basis than the mere question of the alteration of the franchise within the narrow limits of a single borough which would leave all the other boroughs in Ireland in an exceptional position. It has been said that there have been very strong protests against this Bill. I know of none. I have lived in Belfast all my life, and I am not aware of it. There may have been Petitions, but they were not public Petitions, and I have not seen them, and I know nothing of their scope, and, indeed, I never heard of them until now, though, no doubt, as the hon. Member speaks about them, there have been Petitions. All I can say is that I know nothing about them. I remember, however, that on a former occasion we were told that certain witnesses, who desired to be heard against the Bill, were so poor that they were unable to pay the expenses of coming from Belfast to London to give evidence. Yet those poor witnesses, who were said to be two poor to bear the expense of coming to London, and on whose behalf the hon. Member presented a Petition, were afterwards found sitting in the House, having come over, at their own expense no doubt, for the purpose of priming the hon. Member with information. We have been told that the artizans of Belfast are cruelly wronged, and that owing to the heavy taxation imposed by the Corporation rents have been doubled. I can bear testimony, as the owner of a very considerable amount of house property, to the fact that the rents have been doubled in the wrong direction. [A laugh.] Hon. Members from England and Scotland are not likely to understand what I mean. But all my Irish Friends will thoroughly understand the Irishism. The houses of the Belfast artizans have been worth less within the last two or three years, by 20 per cent, than they were formerly. Their value has fallen, and the reason is, not that the population has decreased, but that capital has gone in that direction. The result is that the Belfast artizans can now command a better house and better accommodation than can be obtained for the same money in any other town I have visited—and I have seen a good many—in England and Scotland. [“Oh!”] Yes; I maintain that statement, for I speak from my own personal knowledge. I have lived in Belfast all my life, and I have not acquired my knowledge as a passing stranger visiting special streets for a few hours for special purposes. If any complaint can be justly made it is in reference only to the older portions of the town, and these are being cleared away as rapidly as we can, with a view to improvements, without injury to their poor occupants. Hitherto the difficulty has been that frequently these houses are the only income the poor people have, and we have accordingly shrunk from depriving them of them. But in this Bill we have introduced a clause which will enable us to pay any persons whose dwellings it is found necessary, for sanitary reasons, and for the general public good, to deprive them of. I do not know whether this House requires any information in regard to Belfast. A good deal of information was given to the Royal Commission, and the town was complimented for the manner in which the artizans are housed. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) says that the lighting, paving, and sanitary state of Belfast are a disgrace to civilization. All that is utterly beside the question, and it is not in accordance with facts. We have been told that the streets are paved with "petrified kidneys." Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you never heard that expression before, but it is the nearest description which can be arrived at of the old mode of paving some of the smaller thoroughfares. But it must be remembered that, even in an important city like Belfast, it is impossible to overtake all the desired improvements at once; and it must also be borne in mind that this is a kind of pavement which cost 2s. or 2s. 2d. a-yard, whereas the more modern flagging would cost from 7s. to 7s. 6d. a-yard. Up to a recent period the Corporation of Belfast, in applying to Parliament for special powers, did not consider it necessary to interfere with the gradual development of the town by compulsory legislation; but, for the information of the hon. Member for Sligo and the House, I may say that in recent Acts they have taken power to compel the flagging of the streets, and they refuse to allow the streets to be paved except with flags. A resolution has been passed that every square yard of the old paving shall be taken up and replaced with flagging at a cost of one-third to the owner and two-thirds to the general taxpayers of the town. Surely no more reasonable proposal could be made in view of all the difficulties. We are flagging our leading thoroughfares as fast as we can, and we are providing funds for the complete flagging of the town, from the centre outwards, as our funds enable us, without unduly pressing on the taxpayers. We hope to overtake the work very speedily. In spite of all this, we are asked if we are afraid to trust the people. I know the artisans of Belfast intimately, and I am prepared to state here broadly that I am neither afraid nor ashamed to trust them with the franchise; but I also know that the artisans of Belfast are prepared to express their opinion that they would prefer the general Act dealing with the question to the proposal of the hon. Member for Sligo. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: What is it to them?] It is everything to them. They know perfectly well that with the general Act will come the enlargement of the boroughs. ["No!"] I believe the larger Bill will be passed. If I can help it I certainly will do so, and when the general Bill comes on I shall be ready to give my most earnest attention to every line connected with the franchise in the boroughs. ["Oh!"] If hon. Members below the Gangway are not prepared to do the same, they will, perhaps, find the subject dealt with in a manner they scarcely expect. In conclusion, allow me to come back again to the main question, and to ask the House if it is wise in a Private Bill to adopt a general principle of public law which is absolutely new? ["No!"] I repeat that it is absolutely new. What precedent can be cited for inserting in a Private Bill a Franchise Clause which is altogether foreign to the Bill?—a Franchise Clause of which no public Notice has been given—which is not hinted at in the provisions of the Bill itself, and upon which the inhabitants who will be influenced by it have had no opportunity of expressing an opinion. Is the House prepared to take a course which may hereafter be used as a lever for legislation of the most inconvenient kind? I think the House is scarcely prepared to take such a course. I trust that the good sense of hon. Members will induce them to reject the clause which has now been submitted, and that in fairness and justice they will decide that the duty of effecting a large alteration in the municipal franchise of an important city should be thrown upon a Public Act and not upon a Private Bill.

Mr. STOREY (Sunderland): I only wish to say two or three sentences. I am anxious that it should not be left to the hon. and gallant Member for Finsbury (Colonel Duncan) solely to utter Radical opinions on this question. I heard what my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary proposed; but I cannot help thinking that the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) would be wise to prefer a bird in the hand to a possible two that there may be in the bush. I cannot pretend to understand the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Haslett). I only comprehended one sentence of it, and it was the one in which the hon. Member said he was not afraid to trust the people, but that he is quite willing to grant an extended municipal franchise, not only to the inhabitants of Belfast, but to the people of every other borough in Ireland. If that be really so, I ask him why he does not take the present available opportunity of doing so? I certainly think the Chief Secretary ought to listen to the appeal which has been made to him on this question. He put the case in this way—that if the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) will consent to withdraw the Resolution, the general measure for dealing with the municipal franchise in Ireland may be pushed on; the Government will use their influence to have it passed, and in that way the hon. Member will gain his point. May I put the matter in this way? The general measure may pass this Session or it may not. If it does not, then the hon. Member by passing this Resolution will secure an object which we all, both Liberals and Tories, admit to be necessary and just. If, on the other hand, the General Bill does pass this Session, of which I entertain some doubt, then this plan will become merged in the general law, so that I do not see what inconvenience would arise from inserting it at the present moment. But this reason, without troubling the House further, I am not intended to vote for the plan which has been moved by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Mr. A. J. B. B. B. (Hants, Huntingdon). The hon. Member who moved this plan cast no imputation upon the Committee which considered the merits of this Bill, and over which I had the honour of presiding. I will not therefore, take up the time of the House by defending the action of the Committee. I will merely say that the plan of main drainage proposed by the Bill is a reasonable one, that it will be carried out in the usual way, and that it has received the approval of the most eminent authorities upon the subject of main drainage who exist in the United Kingdom. Then what I desire to put to the House is this—the hon. Gentleman does not go so far as to say that this plan is a bad one, or that it is not required in the interests of the inhabitants of the town of Belfast.

Mr. SEXTON: I said nothing at all about the plan.

Mr. SLATER-BOOTH: I am aware of that; but if the hon. Gentleman's Motion is carried, it may have the effect of prejudicing the future progress of the Bill. The hon. Member takes it as a matter of course that the new constituency which he proposes to create will take the line carved out for them by their predecessors; but I do not see that that would at all follow. By assenting to such a clause, I think that the House would be not only setting a very inconvenient precedent, and one that is entirely unknown, but would be doing something calculated to bring the whole conduct of Public and Private Business into confusion. It might also inflict a serious evil upon the town of Belfast by delaying for an indefinite period the prosecution of this main drainage scheme. It is said that the House of Lords will throw out the Bill, or that, at any rate, they will throw out this clause. Undoubtedly, they would have very good reason for doing so, if they found that advantage was taken of the peculiar privileges afforded by our system of Private Bill legislation to prejudge a question which ought to be dealt with by a general measure, and which is, in fact, dealt with by a Bill now before the House which has already received a second reading, and in regard to which it simply rests with the Government to say whether it shall pass into law this Session or not. I therefore trust that the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) will accept the invitation of the Chief Secretary, and will consent to withdraw the Motion. It might really seem, from some of the language which has been used in the debate, that it was the duty of the Corporation of Belfast to propose, in a Private Bill, an extension of the municipal franchise. Not only was it not their duty to do so, but they would have laid themselves open to serious comment if they had endeavoured, by Private Bill legislation, to anticipate the views of Parliament on the general subject. That is a very important question of principle in regard to which, I imagine, there will be very little dispute. I certainly do not know what anomalies might not be introduced into the provisions of a Private Bill, if this clause dealing with the municipal franchise in Ireland is to pass. Then, again, it is quite possible that the question of the municipal franchise may eventually be dealt with in the General Bill in a very different manner. I really think that the House would be taking an unprecedented step if it were to accept the proposal of the hon. Member, and I hope on reconsideration that the hon. Member himself will accept the advice of the Chief Secretary.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): If I could feel sure that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is correct in the statement he has made to the House, I should not feel it necessary to rise. He has told us that it only depends on the Government whether the General Bill which is to extend the municipal franchise throughout Ireland shall become law this Session. If I could feel sure that he was authorized to speak for his Party in the other House, or if he will give any intimation that he is so authorized, I will not detain the House for one second further with any remarks of mine. I presume that the silence of the right hon. Gentleman must be taken to mean that while he desires to see the general measure pass, he is not quite sure that his Friends in "another place" would give the same aid in carrying out his wishes that he would himself. Now, I quite feel that the Chief Secretary for Ireland has made a very generous offer to the Irish Members; but if the hon. Member who moved the clause goes to a division upon it, I certainly intend to go into the Lobby with him. I therefore deem it necessary to say why I so intend. I do not believe that the Government are strong enough to carry the General Bill in the other House. I do believe that the general disposition of the other House is to throw out Bills of this nature, and to prevent any kind of extension of the suffrage. They would, therefore, delay the passing of this Bill; and I feel that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, if he does not agree with me in opinion, will, at any rate, agree with me in the result. I am going to vote for the clause, because it is one which embodies, as I understand it, a principle which has been repeatedly affirmed in this House, and repeatedly rejected in the other. Although, therefore, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that it is undesirable to get by a side wind that which ought to be asserted in a general Act of Parliament, yet when the broad proposition cannot be obtained, but has been rejected over and over again, I am in favour of obtaining a recognition of the principle in the best way I can. I submit that that is not an unconstitutional course; and I think it will be within the memory of some of the Members of this House that there have been occasions when desirable legislation on the part of this House has been rejected in "another place." I will not go into the wider matter, but some hon. Members will recollect that a clause securing the repeal of the taxes on knowledge found its place into a particular Bill, simply because a more direct measure had been rejected by the House of Lords, and it was known that they would not reject the entire Bill, however reluctant they might be to assent to this one part of it. But, if I understand rightly, there has already been one Private Bill passed in the House of Lords in which the Suffrage Question has been dealt with; and I intend to vote for this clause in the hope that, if a general measure does not pass, at any rate this Bill may pass, and it will be an assertion of the Radicals to allow no opportunity to slip by which an extension of the municipal franchise can be secured.

MR. DILLON Mayo, F.: The right hon. Gentleman who spoke from the Front Bench on this side of the House (Mr. John Morley) made an appeal to us not to proceed with this Motion, as there is every reason to suppose that it may be settled on the broader questions involved in the general Bill. But we have the best evidence, and I need not go further than the Paper circulated by the Corporation of Belfast against this Motion, to show that they will oppose to the very utmost the settlement of the question on the broader basis; for what do they say? They say that they will be content to allow the Bill to drop, and the population of Belfast to suffer from all the evils they propose to remove by their Bill, rather than allow the working men of Belfast to have the municipal franchise extended. They know perfectly well that the moment an extension of the municipal franchise is secured, the supreme influence of the Tory Party in the Town Council will be destroyed, and the insertion of this clause in the present Bill will be quite sufficient for the purpose. Therefore, in the event of the withdrawal of this clause, all their influence, and that of the Tory Party generally, would be brought to bear upon the other House of Parliament to reject the general measure which the Chief Secretary has kindly offered to push through this House. When the Bill reached the other House it would be immediately dealt with as it has repeatedly been before. Now, what are the facts of the case in regard to the proposal to settle the Irish municipal franchise on a wider basis? We are told that the Bill has been read a second time in this House. How many times has it been already read a second time in the House of Commons and not passed? Will hon. Members be surprised to hear that it has passed the House of Commons four or five times; that it was read a second time 10 years ago, and that it has not yet succeeded in passing the House of Lords? The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Haslett) has political Friends in the House of Lords, who have slaughtered the Bill over and over again, and we have listened to the latest apologia from the Corporation of the City of Belfast for not accepting the extension of the franchise which my hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) proposes in his clause. The hon. Member for West Belfast has succeeded in demonstrating to the House his extraordinary ignorance of the state of Irish municipal law, and of the custom and procedure of this House. He said that the term of occupation in Dublin is three years, whereas that provision has been repealed by an Act which became law last year, and it is now enacted that the period shall be 12 months' occupation. That is a specimen of how careful the hon. Member has been in acquiring a knowledge of the law of the subject. Then he also said that under the Municipal Bill the boundaries of Belfast will be extended, whereas there is no such proposal in the Bill at all. That shows the great interest he takes in the general scheme for dealing with the question on a broad basis. We know that there is very little chance of extending the franchise in the borough of Belfast so as to give the ratepayers a voice in the spending of the money, and what we want is that the general body of the people of Belfast should have a voice in the execution of this great work, so that it shall no longer be possible for the richer parts of the town to be well drained, while the poorer parts are badly drained and altogether neglected.

Mr. Dillon

The right hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Selater-Booth) said that nobody before the Committee complained of the scheme or of any of its details. We make no complaint of the plan; but what we desire is that the plan, which will take six or seven years to bring to a conclusion, shall be executed under control of the people who are directly interested in its execution. The execution of the plan is far more important to the people of Belfast than many hon. Members seem to suppose, and we want that they should have full control not only over the execution of the work, but over the expenditure connected with it and the raising of the money. We know, further, that this is our only chance of bringing about a change; if we let this Bill go without this clause we shall have no chance whatever. I come now to the offer which has been made by the Chief Secretary. That offer looked a tempting and plausible offer; but I maintain that the right hon. Gentleman has made an offer which he has no power to carry out. He made the offer to pass the Municipal Franchise Bill through this House. So far so good. He has the power to do that; but he has no power to secure that the Bill shall pass through in "another place." We, however, have the power to secure that this clause shall become law; and what we are invited to do is to abandon that which we have power to do for the sake of another measure, the fate of which is extremely doubtful. The offer of the Chief Secretary cannot secure for us the extension of the municipal franchise in the borough of Belfast; but we believe that the passing of this clause would carry out that object, because, in spite of the braggadocia of hon. Members on the other side, I think the House of Lords would pause before they sacrificed the whole of the Bill, and the expense which the promoters have already incurred in connection with it, for the sake of rejecting this provision. Therefore, if this clause is insisted upon and inserted in the Bill, it will result in one of two things—it will either appear in this Private Bill, or the General Bill, dealing with the question on a wider basis, will be allowed to go through the House of Lords. However, by way of a compromise, what I propose to do is this—to move the adjournment of this debate, and that it should be adjourned to such a period as will enable the House to test the power of the Chief Secretary to settle the question on a broad basis. If the General Bill goes through the House of Lords and becomes law, I need hardly say that my hon. Friend will withdraw his clause and any further opposition to the Private Bill; and I have no doubt, if the hon. Members for Belfast are sincere in their professions, they can assist the Chief Secretary very materially in securing that the General Bill shall become law. I will, therefore, move that the debate be adjourned to this day four weeks, so as to give a reasonable time to see if the Chief Secretary can carry out his offer; and then, if the General Bill becomes law, we will withdraw our opposition; but if that Bill is slaughtered by the House of Lords, every Member of this House will recognize the reasonableness, the justice, and the necessity of the Motion of my hon. Friend as the only mode by which we can achieve the object we have in view.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Dillon)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think the hon. Member has made a very reasonable proposal, and I hope the House will agree to it without a division. There are two points which are quite clear as far as we are concerned. We think it is a very objectionable proceeding to deal with general questions in a Private Bill. On the other hand, there is no doubt—no one has risen in this debate to deny—that the municipal franchise in Belfast is in a most unsatisfactory state. Even the hon. Member for West Belfast Mr. Haslett has admitted that fact. The Government are prepared to give facilities for promoting the general measure for putting that matter on a proper footing, and I may assume that we may count on the support of the Members on that side of the House. After the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast I presume they are prepared to do their best in getting the Bill through. It would not, under those circumstances, take very long to pass through this House. It would then have to go to "another place." We have heard predictions made on both sides of the House as to what may happen to the Bill there.

The right hon. Gentleman opposite Mr. Selater-Booth is confident that it will pass. I do not know whether that will be so or not; but if the Bill did not pass hon. Members sitting below the Gangway will have acquired the strongest and most convincing argument in favour of Home Rule they can possibly desire. If the House of Lords were to refuse a Municipal Franchise Bill—to refuse that which the hon. Member for West Belfast Mr. Haslett declares to be a proper Bill—an argument would be provided in favour of Home Rule such as could not be answered. I therefore assume, with the right hon. Gentleman, that the Bill will succeed. That being so, before the period to which the hon. Member proposes to adjourn the debate arrives, we shall probably have reached the object desired in an unobjectionable manner. I, therefore, trust that that course will be adopted.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.): I do not know what course the hon. Gentlemen who represent Belfast in this House may feel it necessary to take on this subject; but it appears to me that if the proposal of the hon. Member for East Mayo Mr. Dillon is accepted, the town of Belfast may find itself in a somewhat remarkable and awkward position. It is admitted—at least I have not heard it denied—that this Bill is in itself a necessary and a proper Bill; that it contains powers which the Corporation of Belfast ought to possess, and which, indeed, it is necessary for them to have for the proper government of the town. But, Sir, this debate is now proposed to be adjourned until such time as Parliament shall have decided upon a general proposal to reduce the municipal franchise in boroughs throughout Ireland to the point at which hon. Members below the Gangway desire it to stand. Now, I do not imagine that this is the proper moment for discussing whether the municipal franchise of Belfast or of Ireland should be reduced. For myself, I do not think that this franchise is in a satisfactory condition; and it is a matter which may fairly claim to receive full discussion and consideration in this House. I hope the result may be satisfactory, not merely in reference to the municipal franchise in Belfast, but in the other municipal towns of Ireland. Every matter affecting the municipal government of the towns of Ireland will be found exhaustively dealt with in the Report of a Committee over which I had the honour to preside some time ago. But if the course now proposed is taken, what may happen, as it seems to me, to the City of Belfast is this—Supposing that it is found impossible for the general reform of the municipal franchise to be effected even in this House during the present Session, is Belfast on that account to be deprived of those rights and powers which the Corporation think necessary for the proper government of the town, and even for the health of the inhabitants? That is the suggestion. The health of the people is surely of primary importance. It certainly would be most unfair if the postponement of this stage of a Private Bill, until a general measure can be passed, should have the effect of depriving Belfast of the advantages she would obtain under the provisions of this Private Bill. I do not object to an arrangement for the discussion of the larger measure, nor, I imagine, do the hon. Members for Belfast. But I do trust that hon. Members, in whatever part of the House they may sit, and however anxious they may be to deal with the Irish municipal franchise, will also remember that the powers of this Bill are of great importance, because they materially affect the health of a large population. If I am correctly informed, under a Standing Order of the House of Lords, the 25th of June is the last day for receiving Private Bills from this House; and as the adjournment of the debate has now been moved until the 26th, there is considerable danger of the present Bill being lost for this Session. I cannot, therefore, agree to the proposal for adjournment.

MR. DWYER GRAY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): The right hon. Baronet seems to be unaware that the general question has been discussed and settled, as far as the principle is concerned, by passing the second reading. What the opponents of the proposal of my hon. Friend are evidently anxious to secure is that this Bill shall pass through the House without any assurance that the general measure should be dealt with at all. We do not wish to stop this Bill; but what we want to do, in order to meet the objection of the right Gentleman the Chief Secretary—an objection, I think, very much to be regretted, and one which certainly very much astonished me—is to secure, by some means, either by means of the General Bill or otherwise, the extension in Belfast of the franchise so as to assimilate it with that of all the great English towns before Belfast is permitted to incur this enormous expense. It has been suggested on all sides that this is a matter of very great and extreme urgency; but that is really not the view of the authorities in Belfast, and that argument does not hold water for a moment, seeing that the Bill has reference to a subject that has been under discussion for 15 or 20 years, and therefore manifestly is not a matter which must be dealt with instantly. A main drainage scheme, no doubt, is very desirable; but the carrying out of it is not a matter that vitally affects the town of Belfast. In trying to fix on my hon. Friend the responsibility of delay in the event of the House of Lords throwing out the Bill, or the clause we seek to insist on, the Chief Secretary is putting the saddle on the wrong horse. It is completely within the power of the promoters of the Bill to secure the passage of the Bill if they will consent to this clause being inserted. The House of Lords is not at all likely to throw it out of their own Motion. It would be only when entreated to do so by the promoters of the Bill that they would dream of throwing it out if this House is determined to insert it. It is, therefore, unfair to endeavour to fix on us the responsibility of throwing it out. The responsibility must rest solely upon the promoters. But I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he need not have the slightest fear on that account. If the promoters abandon the Bill, they must pay the costs out of their own pockets. They may bluster and threaten to withdraw the Bill; but it is absolutely certain they will do nothing of the kind, because the members of the Town Council of Belfast have as good an appreciation of their own pecuniary interests as any Gentlemen in or out of this House. The right hon. Baronet alluded to the Standing Order. He thinks that by hanging up the Bill until the 28th of June its passage may be endangered; but surely he is aware that, although the 25th of June is fixed as the last day on which the House of Lords will receive a Private Bill from this House, it is perfectly easy to secure the suspension of the Standing Order. The extension of the franchise is a matter of great importance. I certainly have been under the impression that it was the Orange Members for Belfast who have been the Gentlemen to propose this extension of the municipal franchise; and yet I have observed with surprise that they have taken no part in this discussion.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is now travelling beyond the reasons to be urged for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DWYER GRAY: I will only say, in conclusion, that the sole reason which I have heard urged against the Amendment is the suggestion that the Standing Order of the House of Lords would interfere with the progress of the Bill. The Lords would, I believe, suspend their Standing Order. I would urge that there should be a postponement of this Bill for, say, four or five weeks, until we have an assurance that the Municipal Franchise Bill will be passed in the other House. In the meantime, we ought not to lose the opportunity of asserting the principle in the present Bill.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): The hon. Member who has just sat down has taunted the Belfast Members with having maintained an attitude of silence during this debate. I had, however, risen three or four times when the Speaker called upon hon. Gentlemen sitting below the Gangway. As regards the principle of the clause introduced by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) —

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is, perhaps, not aware that the Question now before the House is the Question of the Adjournment, and to that Question the hon. Member must confine himself.

MR. DE COBAIN: I bow, Sir, to your ruling. As regards the Question of Adjournment, I am not a believer in the adjournment of either Imperial or local questions—questions which may more or less seriously affect the interests of the nation. I think this adjournment would present no new phase of the question; and, therefore, I think the Chief Secretary for Ireland has made a very fair proposition, and I entirely agree with it. I am thoroughly in favour of the principle which he has presented of the extension of local influence in municipal matters; but I cannot understand the new phase of the question introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must confine himself to the Question of Adjournment.

MR. DE COBAIN: I only wish to point out that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has supported the views of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who have spoken in favour of the adjournment; and I thought that I might be permitted to say that I disagree with the right hon. Gentleman without being out of Order. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in that respect, is at variance, as I understand him, with the Chief Secretary, who preceded him in this discussion, and who I understood to be in favour of giving facilities for the progress of the Bill. I think that a question of this kind should not be postponed, and I hope the House will reject the Motion for Adjournment.

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid.): I have only a few words to say on the Question of Adjournment, and they are these—If the House refuses now to come to a conclusion in the matter, and if we defer it too long, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for the Corporation to get the Bill through the obstacles which would be interposed to its progress in the other House. I may say that, if the House agrees to an adjournment for a fortnight or three weeks, we should not be opposed to that, if it is not now agreed to take the sense of the House upon it. The question is a very serious and important one for Belfast; and I hope that if this question of the municipal franchise is taken up it will be dealt with by the Government, and not by a Private Bill. Therefore, if the Government will agree to take the matter up, I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to an adjournment of the Belfast Bill for three weeks in the meantime.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be adjourned till Monday, the twenty-eighth day of June next." — Mr. Sexton.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "twenty-eighth," in order to insert the word "twenty-first," — (Sir James Corry,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'twenty-eighth' stand part of the Question."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I am prepared to accept the hon. Baronet's Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I would like to ask the Government upon what day they will be able to take the broader Bill, as that must govern the view of the Irish Members as to date? We do not think the House of Lords would have an opportunity of considering this Bill for at least four weeks; and if they were asked to do so in a shorter period, their Lordships are very fond of complaining that they have not been allowed sufficient time to consider Bills of this sort. The General Bill now stands for Wednesday next; but it stands very low down on the Paper, and cannot be reached on that day. It is the last of 20 or 30 Orders. On Thursday we have the Home Rule Bill, and on Friday the ordinary Motions. Therefore, the first day on which it can be taken is Monday, so that there will have been one week gone. I would, therefore, ask what facilities will be given to press forward the other Bill at once?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby): I think it can be taken on Friday. I would suggest to hon. Members that they should accept the suggestion made by those who represent Belfast. If it comes on, and there is nothing to delay its further progress, it can pass; if anything does happen to prevent the Bill being gone on with, they can propose a further adjournment. We will do all we can to further the Bill here, and send it up to "another place," and if it is accepted before the 21st this Bill can be dealt with. If a further adjournment is required, the matter can be duly considered. I think it would be of great advantage, not only to this Bill, but to the General Bill, that as far as possible we should come to an agreement.

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S.): Allow me to say, Sir, that I accept the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but if the other Bill be not passed, I will reserve to myself the right of making a further proposal until the Lords have declared how they intend to deal with the question. The distinct understanding is, that this Bill is to wait until the Municipal Franchise Bill has passed in the House of Lords.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member withdraw the 28th?

MR. SEXTON: Yes.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'twenty-first' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday 21st June.

QUESTIONS.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF CATTLE— M. PASTEUR'S DISCOVERIES.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the attention of the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council has been directed to the discoveries of M. Pasteur, with regard to the possibility of protecting cattle, sheep, and pigs from certain contagious diseases by inoculation with attenuated virus; whether, in view of the National importance of this question, the Department are prepared to undertake a series of careful experiments to determine the value of the discoveries referred to; and, whether, with the object of at once dealing with one prevalent form of contagious disease, they will be good enough to commence, without delay, the requisite experiments in relation to swine fever?

THE CHANCELLOR (Sir UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH) (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The attention of the Agricultural Department has been called to M. Pasteur's investigations regarding the contagious diseases of cattle; and, by way of a first step in the direction suggested by the hon. Baronet, instructions have been given to Professor Brown to undertake a series of experiments with the virus of swine fever.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—PAY OF LETTER CARRIERS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that Daniel Hartigan, a rural postman, who delivers letters and parcels at Dunns and Dunbacon, has a salary of only six shillings per week; whether he has to walk eight miles each day, including Sunday; and if his case will be inquired into with a view to grant him fair remuneration for the performance of his duties?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): Inquiry is being made respecting this case, and as soon as the Report is received the result will be communicated to the hon. Member.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND)—THE RIVER SHANNON.

Mr JORDAN (Clare, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if the Inspectors of Fisheries called a meeting by public notice to be held at Kilrush, county Clare, on November 27th 1885, to inquire into complaints against fixed nets in the River Shannon, for infraction of the Law; if two of the Inspectors, Messrs. Hayes and Hornsby, attended that meeting; if Mr. John Burns, of Labasheeda, in pursuance of a notice and letter from the Secretary to the Inspectors, travelled a distance of over ten miles to attend that meeting; if, notwithstanding the letter stating that the Inspectors would be glad to hear Mr. Burns' evidence, the question was not satisfactorily gone into, and Mr. Burns only partially heard; if Mr. Burns wrote to ask what decision had been arrived at by the Inspectors, and no reply has been sent to his communication; and, if steps would now be taken to cause the said Inspectors to make a report on the proceedings, and also to state what decision has been given on the subjects complained of?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne): On the date in question two Inspectors of Fisheries held an inquiry at Kilrush into four different subjects, in one of which Mr. Burns was interested. When the case came on it was found that the complainants, who were fishermen, had no professional assistance, and no one to conduct their case, whereas there were three professional representatives on the other side. The Inspectors, nevertheless, gave the fishermen every assistance, and the inquiry was opened. It was soon, however, manifest that neither the ends of justice nor the interests of the fishermen themselves could be served by allowing the inquiry to go on, and the Inspectors accordingly adjourned it, at the same time intimating their willingness to resume it when the complainants were in a better state of preparation to put their case before the Court. Mr. Burns was in Court at the time, and the decision was made known to him as well as the other complainants. The receipt of the letter referred to in the latter part of the Question was acknowledged, and it will be, as he was told, laid before the Board. Owing to local engagements, however, in the country this has not yet been done; but it will be shortly.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—REDUNDANT CLERKS.

Mr. McCULLOCH (Glasgow, St. Rollox) for Mr. MACDONALD CAMERON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in a Treasury Order dated 12th March 1880, granting "certain measures of relief to the redundant clerks" of the Customs, the measures of relief were subject to four specified conditions; whether one of the conditions was that, when any redundant clerks were in receipt of more than £300 per annum, every fourth vacancy on the Upper Division should not be filled up; whether the gradual reduction of the Upper Division clerkships then contemplated has been upset by the reorganizations effected since the date of the Treasury Order, so that many more Upper Division Clerkships have been dropped than those provided for in the Treasury stipulations, whereby the prospects of the redundant clerks have been seriously injured; and, whether, by way of compensation, the maximum salary of the redundant clerks could not be raised to that of Upper Division clerks, without entailing extra cost upon the Exchequer for several years to come, if it would do so at all?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The Treasury Order of March 12, 1880, granting certain measures of relief was subject to four conditions. One of these conditions was that every fourth vacancy in the Upper Division should not be filled up so long as any redundant clerk was in receipt of more than £300 a-year. The gradual reduction of the Upper Division clerkships then contemplated has been upset by the re-organizations effected since the date of the Treasury Order; but this gradual reduction of the Upper Division clerkships has been accompanied by a gradual reduction in the number of the redundant clerks who had the prospect of promotion to them, so that the proportions of the two classes are as nearly as possible the same as they were in 1880. The prospects of the redundant clerks are thus, apparently, the same as in 1880, but, practically, they are not as favourable, because the proportion in the redundant class should be smaller, owing to the promotions made since 1880, and because, in the reductions made in the Upper Division, the older men have been selected for retirement. The result is that the ages of the men in the two classes are now practically much the same, and the prospect of promotion is not good. There are 33 redundant clerks to be considered. If the Treasury agree to raise their maximum salary from £341 to £400, the present maximum salary of the Upper Division, the increased cost to the public would not counterbalance the February, 1889, but no estimate would be given of the cost, as it would depend upon the question whether men were promoted before they attained the existing maximum of £341 which at present must have reached

WAR DEPARTMENT—THE STEAMERS IN THE NILE

MR. W. H. SMITH (Stroud, Westminster) asked the Secretary of State for War, if the light draught steamers which were sent out to Egypt by the War Department for service in the Nile have been withdrawn in safety below Wady Halfa, and, whether it is proposed to hand over any of them to the Egyptian Government?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE MR. CAMPBELL-BARNES (Stirling, &c.) The three Thornycroft stern-wheel steamers which I presume are those to which my right hon. Friend refers, have never been south of the First Cataract. They are at present at or north of Assuan. These boats are officered, manned, and properly armed for. I am not aware of any intention of handing them over to the Egyptian Government.

Mr. Henry H. Fowler

REPUBLIC OF HAYTI—IMPRISONMENT OF A BRITISH SUBJECT.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND (Hampstead) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to the case of a Mr. Coles, a British subject, who was, as he alleges, unlawfully tried and sentenced to imprisonment at Port au Prince; and, whether any steps have been or will be taken to investigate the facts of the case, and, if his statement be correct, to obtain redress for Mr. Coles?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE MR. BLYDEN (Aberdeen, S.) Her Majesty's Government are fully acquainted with the details of the trial, which led to a sentence of three years' imprisonment being passed on Mr. Coles by the Haytian Court of Assize. In their opinion, that trial was a gross miscarriage of justice. Her Majesty's Government have made vigorous representations to the Haytian Government on this subject, but so far without effect. Her Majesty's Government are exceedingly anxious, as Commissioners to Port au Prince, Mr. Clement Hill of the Foreign Office, who will be instructed to call the serious attention of the Haytian Government to this case, as well as to the complaints received from other British subjects resident in Hayti, of acts of aggression and denial of justice to which they had been subjected by the Haytian Authorities.

THE CURRENCY—CIRCULATION OF FOREIGN COPPER COIN

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that Foreign copper coins circulate in increased quantities, reaching in the East of London to one-fifth of the copper coin current, and, whether the Government intend to take steps to prevent loss from falling upon the working classes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Sir William Harcourt (Derby) in reply, said, that, while not accepting the statement of the hon. Member as to the amount of the coins in question in circulation, it was the intention of the Government to introduce legislation on this subject in the Revenue Bill.

PUBLIC PETITIONS — PETITIONS AGAINST HOME RULE.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to the fact that the officials of the Cork Spinning and Weaving Company, and of the Ulster Spinning and Weaving Company, have been urging their employees to sign Petitions against Home Rule; and, whether there is any means by which such conduct can be punished? The hon. Member said, he wished to point out that there had been a typographical error in the printing of the Question. "Cork Spinning Company" should be "York Street Spinning Company."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I thought it was. We have found, so far as we could learn in regard to the Ulster Spinning Company, that it is said that the movement originated amongst the workers themselves. I cannot speak as to the other Company, because I was not quite sure what it meant; but I may say that these are matters in which the Government cannot well interfere.

ARMY CONTRACTS—REGIMENTAL SUPPLIES.

MR. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that the contract for supplying the canteen of the 11th Hussars at Ballincollig Barracks was by order of the Colonel transferred from a local contractor to one of the Army Supply Associations, against the expressed wish of the sergeants of the regiment; whether he is aware that Colonel Kelly-Kenny, of the 1st Battalion Queen's Royal West Surrey Regiment, while stationed at Cork Barracks, took means to ascertain the feeling of the sergeants of his regiment as to dealing locally or otherwise for the regimental supplies, and that they unanimously decided in favour of local dealing; and, whether, under all the circumstances, he will consider whether it is desirable that measures should be taken for ensuring that these contracts for regiments should only be conferred under an open system of competition by tender?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): Sir, I am informed that in consequence of some irregularity in the payment to the sergeants' mess of the 11th Hussars, the officer commanding directed that through a committee payments would have to be made weekly. This had the effect of diverting the custom from the local contractor. In the 1st Battalion Surrey Regiment, the sergeants, on being asked, expressed an opinion in favour of local dealing. I agree with the hon. Member that the best method for obtaining supplies is by open competition; but the regulation for a committee of sergeants' messing and of leaving a large discretion to their committees of management works very well, and gives satisfaction to the Army, and I do not think it is desirable that the management should be interfered with by any directions on the subject.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — THE CLARE-MORRIS UNION — DESTITUTION.

MR. JAMES O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the medical officer of the Claremorris Union has, after an inspection of the poorer parts of his district, reported to the Board of Guardians that—

"Destitution prevails to a large extent. Many of these poor people are suffering severely from the want of, and inability to procure, the necessary amount of food to sustain them in health. I therefore apprehend that, unless assistance can be had for them, fever and other low and debilitating diseases will be the result."

and, seeing that, in a resolution of the Board of Guardians of that Union, it is stated that—what is to be done to meet this state of distress?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, the Report of the medical officer has been before the Local Government Board. They have written to the Guardians, calling attention to the provisions of the recent Relief Act, and expressing their willingness, if so desired, to order an extension of the scope of outdoor relief. But there is no means by which the Guardians could be afforded extraneous assistance. They must provide out of their own resources support for the poor of their own Union.

ACTS—ABORTION AMONG CATTLE.

MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If he is aware that abortion in cattle is contagious, and is rapidly on the increase, and annually responsible for the premature death of thousands of calves; and, if he will consider the advisableness of scheduling abortion in cattle under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act?

THE CHANCELLOR (Sir UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH) (Lancashire, Clitheroe): Abortion among cattle is, doubtless, a cause of heavy losses; but there is no evidence that it is rapidly on the increase. The recurrence of such cases is due to a variety of causes, including insufficient precautions in cleansing places where it has occurred. But abortion is not a contagious disease, and does not call for the intervention of an Inspector, or the slaughter of cattle, and cannot, therefore, be included among the diseases to which the Act applies.

ARMY DISCIPLINE ACT—REDRESS OF WRONG—APPEALS.

MR. R. POWER (Waterford) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, when officers applied to the Duke of Cambridge, under the "Redress of Wrong, Army Discipline Act," he will make it compulsory on Generals commanding districts to forward the letters within eight days to the War Office; whether it is true that a case has lately occurred in the northern district of an officer of rank and service in the battlefield appealing to the Duke of Cambridge under the "Army Discipline Act;" and, whether his letters were not only delayed for several weeks, but strong measures applied to induce him to withdraw them and to leave the Army?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that General Officers are bound to forward appeals without delay; but there are many advantages in allowing them some discretion as to time. With regard to the particular case referred to, I cannot answer the Question without knowing the name of the officer concerned. If I am furnished with that information I will cause inquiry to be made.

WAR DEPARTMENT—THE 43-TON GUNS.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, What steps have been taken to prevent risk from the firing of guns of similar construction to the 43-ton gun which recently failed, pending inquiry into the cause of failure, and the best means of strengthening such guns; also to state the names of any members of the Committee appointed to inquire into the recent failure of the 43-ton gun who have not been directly or indirectly concerned in the design, construction, consideration, or approval of guns of this description; and how many guns have been constructed, and how many guns have been issued and are in service, of similar construction to the 43-ton gun which recently failed, and at what cost per gun?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): The guns will not be fired again, under ordinary circumstances, until strengthened by being chase-hooped, an operation which can be easily and rapidly effected. Fourteen guns of this class have been constructed. Three have been appropriated to the land service, and 11 to the Navy. The cost per gun is about £6,000. The Members of the Committee who have not been directly concerned in any previous consideration of questions affecting this gun are the President, Lieutenant General Sir Michael Biddulph, the Vice President, Admiral Ward, Captain Hammill, R.N., General Fraser, Colonel Baylay, Colonel Davies, Major Colquhoun, and Mr. Gledhill.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY—RESTORATION.

MR. W. H. SMITH (Strand, Westminster) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If Her Majesty's Government are now prepared to take steps to provide in some way the necessary funds for the maintenance of the fabric of Westminster Abbey, for which the existing provision has been found to be wholly inadequate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby)

(who replied) said, that his right hon. Friend had requested him to say that he hoped to introduce within a few days the Dean and Chapter Bill of last Session, with certain Amendments, which would arrest the hostility which the Bill had encountered last Session. This Bill would provide for the case of Westminster Abbey.

SALE OF CROWN LANDS (IRELAND) — THE FORT OF CULMORE.

MR. T. M. HEALY Londonderry, S., asked the Secretary to the Treasury. Does any record exist as to the terms and conditions on which the Fort and lands of Culmore, county Derry, were sold by Government to the Irish Society of London about twenty-five years ago?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E. : The fort of Culmore and the lands held with it were granted by the Crown to the Irish Society in fee in the Reign of Charles II., the Crown retaining the right to appoint a Governor of the fort, who was not only to enjoy the rents of the lands annexed to it, but also to receive an annuity of £200, Irish currency, from the Society. The legal interest in both the fort and the lands was, however, vested absolutely in the Society. The fort itself not being necessary for defensive purposes, and the Governorship being a sinecure, Her Majesty's Government determined, on the death of the last Governor of the fort, Field Marshal the Earl of Strafford, in 1859, to come to an arrangement with the Society, and it was finally agreed in 1861 that the Society should pay to the Treasury the sum of £12,000, in return for which the Crown gave up in favour of the Society all claims in respect of the lands and fort, and surrendered its right of appointing a Governor of the fort. In consequence of the arrangement, the lands became the entire property of the Society, and the liability of the Society to pay the annuity of £200 was extinguished.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked whether any provision had been taken in the arrangement that there should be no increases of rents on the tenants' improvements?

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: I can hardly answer a Question without Notice which relates to what took place in 1859.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — IMPRISONMENT OF MAURICE MOLONY AND OTHERS.

MR. LALOR Queen's Co., Leix asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the case of Maurice Molony, Michael Galvin, Cornelius M'Auliffe, and James Quinlan, who were tried and convicted before Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, at the Cork Winter Assizes of 1881, and sentenced to penal servitude for five years, If it be true that there is a prison regulation by which 12½ months are allowed to a prisoner sentenced to a term of five years, provided he does not violate the prison rules; whether Maurice Molony or Michael Galvin ever broke the prison rules; were Maurice Molony and Michael Galvin entitled to their discharge on or about the 6th of November last, and are they still in prison; does a prisoner for every breach of the prison rules receive some days' punishment, and are those days deducted from the 12½ months which he would otherwise have a claim to as a reduction of his term of imprisonment; were Cornelius M'Auliffe and James Quinlan, who suffered a loss of one month from their claim to a reduction of 12½ months in consequence of having broken the prison rules, entitled to their discharge on or about the 6th day of December last, and are they still in prison; and will the Chief Secretary order the release of the said Maurice Molony, Michael Galvin, Cornelius M'Auliffe, and James Quinlan from prison?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY MR. JOHN MORLEY Newcastle-on-Tyne : Sir, the facts are substantially, I believe, as stated in the hon. Member's Question. The release of convicts on licence before the expiration of their sentence is frequently delayed by the Crown in the exercise of statutory authority for special reasons. In these cases the release has been delayed in consequence of the disturbed state of the part of the country from which the prisoners came. The time has now, I think, arrived when the case of these men may be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant with a view to their release on licence, and I will give instructions accordingly.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—
SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—THE MAY EXAMINATIONS—ELIGI-BILITY OF PUPILS IN NATIONAL SCHOOLS TO EARN PAYMENTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, What has been the result of his communication with the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland with regard to the eligibility of pupils enrolled in the sixth class in Irish National Schools to earn payments under the Science and Art Department at the May examinations?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, S.): Sir, in answer to the hon. Member I have to say that, owing to a misapprehension, the letter to the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland was only sent about 10 days ago, and we have not yet received an answer. The teachers in Ireland will not suffer, however, on account of this delay, as no change in the rules can be made until the new Directory or Code of the Science and Art Department has been issued, which will be in about six weeks. Before then, the matter will be fully inquired into.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—RIOT-ING AT DOWNPATRICK.

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true (as stated in The Sheffield and Rotherham Independent of May 28th) that at Downpatrick, on May 27th, four lads were charged under an Act of Edward III. with disorderly conduct, by shouting and cheering for Home Rule after ten o'clock at night, and were each sentenced to three months' imprisonment; and, if true, whether he will state to the House what this Act of Edward III. is; and, whether it is really intended that these boys should be kept in prison for three months?

MR. SMALL (Down, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, might I ask if it is not also a fact that the magistrates only allowed one hour to obtain bail, and thereby increased the difficulty of finding bail?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I cannot answer as to details. The hon. Gentleman has just brought before the House a question of bail which I cannot answer. There are three Questions on this subject on the Paper to-day, which, with the permission of the House, I will answer together. The four young men referred to were not exactly boys, all but one being over age, and that one over 20. They were brought before the Downpatrick Bench for disorderly conduct at night in the public streets, cursing, and using violent Party expressions. Three local magistrates presided. The defendants were ordered to give moderate security for their future good behaviour, or, in default, to be imprisoned; and, as a matter of fact, were all released on bail the next day. As the Towns Improvement Act—under which proceedings of this nature are an offence—is not in force in Downpatrick, the prosecution was under 34 Edward III., c. 1, and the Justices' Commission. The Statute of Edward enables magistrates to take security of persons for their good behaviour, when their conduct is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and I understand that prosecutions under it are by no means uncommon.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.) asked who were the magistrates, and also how many Catholics were on the Downpatrick Bench? He would also ask whether the Statute of Edward III. only applied to marauders and murderers?

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, he was obliged to point out that he had answered the paragraph in question. He was unable to say how many Catholics were on the Downpatrick Bench.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE CORONERSHIP OF NORTH ANTRIM.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that, although in accordance with his suggestion, a memorial of five Justices has been sent to the Viceroy to appoint additional polling places for the Coroner's election in North Antrim, the High Sheriff has fixed the nomination for Monday (to-day) and the polling for Wednesday; and, will the Government take any steps to secure proper facilities to the voters in the district for recording their votes?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I received, on the 28th of this month, a copy of the original memorial sent to the Lord Lieutenant in regard to this matter. I find, upon inquiry, that it was received in Dublin yesterday. The writ having been issued, and the dates of nomination and the polling having been fixed, there is, I am advised, no power to deal with the matter before the coming Election. I should explain that these fixtures were made before the Question of the hon. and learned Member, some days ago, was put.

In reply to a further Question.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY said, he had every reason to believe that the arrangements had been made in perfect good faith.

DEVONPORT DOCKYARD THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

CAPTAIN PRICE Devonport asked the Secretary of State for War. Whether it is the usual custom to close the gun wharves at Devonport on Friday afternoon, when Her Majesty's Birthday is kept on a Saturday; and, why the usual course has not been followed this year?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BASSERMAN Stirling, &c. : I find that it was through inadvertence that the half-holiday was not granted on Friday. The men will be allowed the time on another day.

POST OFFICE—POSTAGE TO AUSTRALIA

Mr. HENRIKER HEATON Canterbury asked the Secretary to the Treasury. Is the Postmaster General aware that the Government of Germany has made arrangements to send letters from Germany to Australia for 2½d. each; and, will the Postmaster General at once take measures to reduce the cost of postage on letters from England to Australia from 6d. to 2½d. per letter to protect the revenue and encourage trade?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER Wolverhampton, E. : The Postmaster General is not aware of any such arrangements. Moreover, there is every reason to believe that the Australian Colonies, which, on fiscal grounds, have always declined to join the Postal Union, would object to any reduction of the present postage rates.

STATE OF IRELAND—MOCK FUNERAL AT WOODFORD, CO. GALWAY.

CAPTAIN MCALMONT (Antrim, E. asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Whether a mock funeral was recently held in Woodford, county Galway, at which a large number of persons were present, who marched up and down the town with a band playing, preceded by a coffin bearing the inscription "Death to Orangemen and Freemasons;" whether the coffin was set fire to and burnt, amidst great public exultation and delight, within a few yards of where Finlay was brutally murdered last March; whether the police were confined to barracks during these proceedings; whether in Lurgan, a short time since, a number of Orangemen were accompanying the funeral of a member of the Orange Institution, and were ordered by the police to take off their colours when going through the town; and, whether he can give any reason for the apparently different course pursued by the police on these occasions?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne : The reasons for the apparently different courses pursued by the police on these two occasions is, that in the case of Lurgan there was sworn information that a serious collision would take place if the procession attempted to pass through the Catholic portion of the town wearing Party colours. In the case of the Woodford procession no such collision was to be feared.

Mr. JOHNSTON Belfast, S. said, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered the first and second paragraphs of the Question.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY said, he believed that those paragraphs gave a fairly correct description of what occurred.

ECCLÉSIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS — EVICTIONS NEAR BREAM'S BUILD- INGS, CHANCERY LANE.

Mr. INCE Islington, E. asked the honourable Member for Llanneeston, as an Ecclesiastical Commissioner. Whether the order for the eviction of 1,000 poor people, in 1874, from land near Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane, by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, was actually given by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners themselves, or by the Church Estates Commission, and, if by the latter, whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had not the power to make rules to restrain wholesale evictions; what were the names of the Commissioners who were present at the meeting when the above order for eviction was given, or who were otherwise responsible for it; whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would undertake that, before any order for the giving of notice to quit, or for evicting more than fifteen persons of the labouring classes in any one locality was made by them, precautions should be taken that notice of such intended order, specifying number of persons to be evicted, locality in which they lived, and reasons for eviction, should be given to each member of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the like notice should be laid for one month upon the Tables of both Houses of Parliament; whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, after having evicted the 1,000 poor people, were now sanctioning the destruction of their church, viz. St. Thomas in the Liberty of the Rolls, on the alleged ground that there was now no population; whether it is a fact that, at present, there is a large day population in the parish or district belonging to the church, comprising large numbers of young men, among whom a clergyman might usefully work, and that this will be greatly increased when the Ecclesiastical Commissioners let the land which has now stood vacant for many years; and, whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners will give a Return of the sums which they deduct for "commission" on money which passes through their hands and the rates of commission which they charge, and to whom eventually such sums are paid, and also the amount charged during the past year to donors of land by them or their solicitor for the legal expenses, exclusive of stamps?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. D. ACLAND, Cornwall, Launceston): In reply to the first paragraph of the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to state that the order for clearing the ground alluded to was given by the Estates Committee. The removal of the inhabitants took place gradually. There was no wholesale eviction. Any regulations made by the General Board have by law to be laid on the Table of the House; but none have hitherto been required. I am not prepared to give the names asked for in the second paragraph; nor am I prepared to make any such undertaking on behalf of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as is asked for in the 3rd paragraph. The contemplated removal of the church named in the Question was initiated by the late Bishop of the diocese, and is entirely approved by his successor, who is fully aware of the circumstances of the case after careful inquiry. The Commissioners do not agree in the opinion conveyed in the 5th paragraph; but the resident population is not likely to increase. With regard to the 6th paragraph, the Commissioners are at a loss to understand to what the first part of it refers; but if it relates to receivership, the figures appear in the Appendix to the Commissioners' annual Parliamentary Report. The amount charged for the legal expenses mentioned was, I believe, £309 7s. 7d.

—DISMISSAL OF THE SCHOOL-
MISTRESS OF BALLYCAREW, CO.
WEXFORD.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Wexford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the recent dismissal from the office of National Schoolmistress at Ballycarew, county Wexford, of Miss Hanlon, by the Rector of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Gerrard; whether the reason for this dismissal was alleged to be the fact that Miss Hanlon had attended a special service at the local Methodist Church; and, whether she had in any way contravened the Rules of the National Education Board; and, if not, whether steps will be taken to reinstate her in her position?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, the Commissioners of National Education have heard nothing of this matter, beyond receiving an intimation from the teacher of the school that the teacher's resignation will take place about the end of next month. An Inspector visited the school a few days ago, and in his Report he makes no reference to any exceptional circumstances. We may therefore presume that, if any injustice was contemplated, some sort of representation would have been made by the teacher herself to the Department.

MERCHANDIZE MARKS ACT, 1862.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) asked, What were the intentions of the Government as to their promised legislation on this subject?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE Mr. C. T. D. ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston): My right hon. Friend the President answered this same Question on May 6, to the hon. Member for the Central Division of Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent). He then stated:—

"We had prepared a measure before Easter for the amendment of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1862; but, after conferring with our Representatives at the International Conference at Rome, including the Master Cutler, it was deemed advisable not to introduce a measure until after the Conference had completed its labours."—3 Hansard, [305] 365.

I may now add that the Delegates to the Industrial Property Convention have returned from Rome, and their official Report is in course of preparation. The Amendments to the Bill rendered necessary to carry out the Resolutions of the Convention are in the hands of the draftsman, and the Bill will be introduced when they are finally settled.

THE GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND AND THE LAND PURCHASE BILLS.

Mr. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of his declaration that the two questions of Land and Irish Government were closely and inseparably connected, and has since stated that

"The position of the Government is simply this . . . to establish by a vote on the Second Reading the principle of the Government of Ireland Bill,"

he can now inform the House whether the Government still regard the Land Bill as an essential portion of their policy, and the two Bills as still inseparable the one to the other; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to establish by a vote on the Second Reading the principle of the Land Purchase Bill?

THE FIRST LORD Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Mid Lothian: With regard to the first portion of his Question, I am not able to give any answer to my right hon. Friend beyond what I gave to an hon. Gentleman opposite three or four days ago—that is to say,

I have no new declaration to make on the subject of the relation existing between the Government of Ireland Bill and the Land Purchase Bill. With respect to the second portion of the Question, I can give an answer to my right hon. Friend. I do not think that the Government could ask the House to pass any judgment upon the Land Purchase Bill, excepting at a time when what I may call the principal Bill is on the Orders of the Day with a view to its prompt or immediate prosecution through its stages. That being so, it is not our intention to ask for any vote upon the Land Purchase Bill after the determination of the House has been given upon the second reading of the Government of Ireland Bill. I may say that I think when the first Question was put to me as to the Government of Ireland what I announced was that we did not intend to take any proceedings upon the Bill or on the subject after the second reading.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL—[BILL 181.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

[EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question 10th May, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR HENRY TYLER Great Yarmouth said, that before the debate was resumed he wished to ask a question on a point of Order—one of the most important that was ever brought before the Speaker to decide. That question referred to the proceedings which took place in the House on Friday night last. It would be remembered that there was a very interesting discussion on that evening between the noble Marquess

[Eighth Night.]

the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) on the one hand, and the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the other; and, as the result of that discussion, it appeared that the Government had determined not to proceed—and, indeed, the Prime Minister had told them again that evening that they would not proceed—any further this Session with the Government of Ireland Bill, after the division on the second reading had been disposed of, and that at the end of the Session Parliament would be prorogued. Inasmuch, then, as the Bill, as the noble Marquess had said, was practically dead, and as the Bill was now admitted by the Government to be in that condition, he wished to ask whether it was in accordance with the principles and practice of the Procedure by which that House was governed that a Bill, under such circumstances, should be debated night after night? ["Order!"] He submitted that that was a very grave and important question. He knew that there were numerous precedents for a Bill being abandoned after the second reading; but he ventured to suggest that there never had been any previous case in which a Bill, declared by the Government to be abandoned, and admitted to be practically dead, had been gone on with and discussed after that fashion. He asked whether it would not be a most unjustifiable and outrageous waste of time to go on discussing night after night this Bill, which was admittedly dead? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. Member to Order. He must confine his observations to the point of Order which he was raising, and must not make any comments. What is the question of Order which the hon. Member wishes to raise?

SIR HENRY TYLER said, that the question which he wished to put was simply this—whether it was in accordance with the principles and practice of the Procedure in that House that it should proceed from night to night to discuss the Home Rule Bill after Her Majesty's Government had intimated that they would not proceed with it that Session, and after the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that Parliament would be prorogued at the end of the present Session, and after the House had, therefore, been informed officially that the Bill would be thus abandoned?

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth, I have to say that nothing has come to my knowledge as to any statement of any Minister, or as to any understanding which alters my view in reference to the point of Order with regard to this Bill. The Bill stands for second reading to-night according to the Orders of the House, and no facts have come to my knowledge officially to show that the Bill is about to be withdrawn from the Orders of the Day; and I do not, therefore, see any reason to interfere, nor have I anything to do with what may be the ulterior stages of the Bill.

Debate resumed.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.) said, that the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir Richard Webster), in the able speech with which he closed the debate on Friday night last, had made some strong criticisms upon the doctrine which the Prime Minister had laid down with regard to the responsibility of that House at the different stages of this Bill. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) did not propose to enter into a conflict between two such high authorities as the Prime Minister and an ex-Attorney General, especially in the absence of the latter; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman had been present he should have wished to have quoted to him a precedent upon the point at issue which would be binding upon the Prime Minister, inasmuch as he himself had been a party to making the precedent, and which was binding upon hon. Members opposite as an example set by their late Leader—Mr. Disraeli—in moving the second reading of his Reform Bill in 1867. On that occasion certain Resolutions were proposed and were withdrawn, a Bill was introduced and was withdrawn, and, finally, a second Bill was introduced. The introduction of the latter Bill—for history was prone to repeat itself—cost the Government of that day three Cabinet Ministers of the first importance, and when its second reading was moved all its details were strongly attacked. On that occasion the present Prime Minister said that—

Sir Henry Tyler

"If the Question to be put from the Chair were that the Bill should be read a third time, instead of a second time, he did not hesitate to say that the measure would be rejected by a very large majority."

and he then referred to nine or ten vital points of the Bill which must be altered before it could be allowed to pass. In the controversy which arose on this Bill the senior Member for Birmingham Mr. John Bright said that, from the Preamble to the last word of the Bill, there was not one single provision which a real intelligent Reformer could consent to. The present Marquess of Salisbury, who was then Viscount Cranborne, and who then occupied, towards the Government and the measure, the same relative position which the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) now occupied with reference to the present Government and the present Bill, pressed the Government to say what course they intended to take on those disputed vital points, and urged that those who asked them to support the second reading of the Bill were "asking them to take a leap in the dark." Mr. Disraeli, however, who was a great master of political strategy, almost in the very words which the Prime Minister himself used on Friday night, firmly declined to be taught tactics by his political opponents. Mr. Disraeli was unmoved and immovable, and he said that "He had heard much of changes of Parties and of combinations, but that all he could say on behalf of himself and his Colleagues was that they had no other wish than to bring the question before the House for settlement."

In the end, the second reading of the Bill was carried. It was completely eviscerated in Committee; so that, when the Bill passed its third reading, scarcely one of its important provisions remained unchanged; and, in point of fact, it was a totally different measure, only preserving its main principle intact, of amending the law with regard to the representation of the people. There was, therefore, sufficient precedent for the House reading a measure a second time with the full knowledge that many of its details would be altered in Committee. The hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight had further said that this measure would impair the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; but he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) denied that there was any foundation for the hon. and learned Member's assertion. In fact, had he believed that there was any ground for that assertion, he should have ranked himself among the opponents of the Bill. The position of Her Majesty's Government upon that point was that there was, and could be, but one Sovereign Parliament in the British Empire, and that Imperial Parliament could not denude itself of one jot or tittle of its own legislative supremacy. It could do almost everything, but one thing it could not do. It was impossible for that Parliament to pass any Act that should bind its successors, or prohibit them from repealing it if they thought fit to do so. Thus, in the case of the Act of Union between England and Scotland, one of the fundamental provisions was that the Professors of the Scotch Universities should subscribe to the Confession of Faith, and yet that provision had been swept away by subsequent legislation. Again, by the 5th Article of the Act of Union between England and Ireland, it was attempted to establish eternally the Irish Church, and yet that Establishment had been abolished by the Imperial Parliament. The hon. and learned Gentleman had further said that if, in the future, any dispute were to arise between the Imperial and the Irish Parliaments, the Irish Judges would be bound to obey the latter. Reasoning from the cases of our Colonial Legislatures, he Mr. Henry H. Fowler asserted that the Irish Judges would be bound to obey the Acts of the Imperial Parliament, whenever they came into conflict with those of the Irish Parliament. Professor Dicey had dealt with this case, taking as an illustration a supposed conflict between the Imperial Parliament and the Parliament of Victoria. Professor Dicey, at page 100 of his work on The Law of the Constitution, says—

"If a Victorian law really contradicts the provisions of an Act of Parliament extending to Victoria, no Court throughout the British Dominions could legally, it is clear, give effect to the Victorian enactment. This is an inevitable result of the Legislative Sovereignty exercised by the Imperial Parliament. In the supposed case the Victorian Parliament commands the Judges to act in a particular manner, and the Imperial Parliament commands them to act in another manner. Of these two commands the order of the Imperial Parliament is the one that must be obeyed. This is the very meaning of Parliamentary Sovereignty."

[Eighth Night.]

The hon. and learned Gentleman also took the objection that under the provisions of the Bill the Imperial Parliament would be restricted in its action by the decisions of the Privy Council. To that objection he replied that the duty of the Privy Council was to interpret Acts of Parliament, and not to legislate. With regard to the veto of the Crown, it was quite clear that under the Bill the Lord Lieutenant would act upon the advice of the Irish Executive, subject, of course, to an appeal to the Privy Council. But, if the Irish Parliament attempted to legislate on any Imperial subject, that veto would be subject to any instructions which might from time to time be given him by Her Majesty. In that event, he wanted to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman upon whose advice such instructions would be given? Why, they would be given upon the advice of the Ministry possessing the confidence of, and responsible to, the Imperial Parliament. A great many very able speeches had been delivered in that debate in opposition to the Bill; but he had noticed that one marked characteristic which had distinguished the great bulk of those speeches was a total want of recognition of the present political difficulties arising out of the condition of Ireland, and its relations to this country. The speeches seemed to him, to use a popular simile, to relegate the present political condition of Ireland to Jupiter and Saturn. But they had to deal, not with a legal, but with a practical question. They had to confront, not abstract theories, but a living people, alive to all the susceptibilities and sentiments, and he might say prejudices, of national feeling; and, at the same time, they had to deal with a Constitutional difficulty of the gravest magnitude and of immeasurable importance. An hon. Member, speaking on Friday night, said that the Government, while putting forward their measure as a remedy for the state of Ireland, had not told the House the evil which it was intended to cure. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) would endeavour to approach the question from the point of view of the evil which they had to cure, and the political remedy which they wanted to apply. But, first, he wished to express his strong objection to the assumption which had pervaded a good many speeches on the Ministerial side of the House, in opposition to the Government, that the opponents of the measure were the exclusive friends and champions of the Union, and that those who advocated the Bill were Disunionists, Disloyalists, and Separatists. [Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered that observation, but he frankly conceded to them what he claimed for himself. He thought that those who called upon them to retain the Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland at any cost were bound to point out to them how that Union had stood the test of experience. He might be deluded; he might be pursuing a wrong course; but he claimed, equally with others, that his own desire was to promote a true and permanent Union between the two countries; but that was entirely different from the Legislative Union. It must be understood that he was now arguing the question from the Unionist standpoint, and that those Gentlemen who defended a Legislative Union were bound to tell them, not what the Union was intended to be, not what it ought to be, not what it might have been, but what it had been and what it was. Had that Act, in the defence of which such great political force and great political intelligence were rallying, had that, as they called it, fundamental Act stood the test of time? It had been tried under every conceivable political circumstance, by every variety of Administration, by both political Parties, with Constitutional liberty and Constitutional law, with exceptional, arbitrary, coercive legislation, under sectarian ascendancy, and with religious equality, accompanied by agrarian legislation of the worst kind, and agrarian legislation of the best kind, by competent and incompetent Chief Secretaries and Lord Lieutenants. They could suggest no political situation, no political difficulty, no political advantage, with which this Union had not been familiar. And what had been the dreary, monotonous, unvarying result? Hopeless, absolute, and irretrievable failure. Had it fulfilled the anticipations of any of those who were active in promoting it? In order to show how little it had done in that direction, he would give one or two quotations from the principal authors of the Union. The first was King George III. His Majesty, in a private and confidential letter to Mr. Pitt, dated February 1, 1801, indicated not only his own private opinion, but the public action he took apparently without the advice of responsible Ministers, when addressing a deputation from both Houses of Parliament. The King said—

"When the Irish propositions were transmitted to me by a Joint Message from both Houses of the British Parliament, I told the Lords and Gentlemen sent on that occasion, that I would with pleasure and without delay forward them to Ireland. But I could not help acquainting them that my inclination to Union with Ireland was principally founded on the trust that the union of the Established Churches of the Two Kingdoms would forever shut the doors to any further measures with respect to the Roman Catholics."

The King spoke not only as a Sovereign, but as the Head of a political Party existing in those days, and known as the "King's Friends," which was so powerful as to be able to displace Mr. Pitt. They had here the honest, transparent views of the King, in which he declared the Union to him was a barrier against the concession of civil rights to the Roman Catholics. And the King was right. If Ireland had retained her own Parliament, that humiliating chapter of their history would never have been written, which told of the broken pledges to the Roman Catholics, of their long struggle for political freedom, and of the final surrender of the Duke of Wellington, not to reason or justice, but to the dread of civil war. It was the legislation of 1820, and of 1869, that had swept away the principle on which the King and a large portion of the Tory Party desired Legislative Union between England and Ireland. Then, again, Mr. Pitt, in a confidential letter to the King, stated what was his intention in promoting the Union. He said—

"The great object of the Union is the tranquillizing of Ireland and attaching it to this country."

Had either of those objects been attained? Whatever else the Union might have achieved, it had absolutely, signally failed in securing the objects at which Mr. Pitt aimed, and for which he lavished the gold, the titles, and all the other means of portage by which the Irish Parliament sold its barterright. If Mr. Pitt could come back to this House, he would find that, at the expiration of nearly a century, the tranquillity of Ireland, and the attachment of Ireland to this country, were just the two things which mocked their legislation, and eluded their grasp. After 86 years' experience of the Union, with the extended franchise in Ireland, under which the population were in possession of electoral rights of which Mr. Pitt had never dreamed, they had in that House—and he did not wish to be offensive, he wished to call a spade a spade—a solid, organized body of Irish Representatives acting in a manner unique in the history of Parliament. Many of those hon. Members differed among themselves on social and political questions; but every difference of opinion on other points was dominated by the one desire to obtain an independent political existence for their country—the object for which the Irish people had sent them to Parliament. The attachment of Ireland to Great Britain, for which the Union was promoted, was now demonstrated by the presence in that House of a body of Members from Ireland, who avowed that they treated Imperial questions entirely in the light in which they thought they would best advance the one object of Irish interest and Irish sentiment. In the last Parliament many Votes of Censure were proposed on the policy of the Government. In the most crucial Vote, the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool said that the Irish section, in determining to walk into the Lobby to censure the Government, were not thinking so much of Egypt, but were thinking of Ireland.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The hon. Gentleman will doubtless excuse me for interrupting him. I said that hon. Members from Ireland thought more of Ireland than of Egypt.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER, said, he was quite willing to accept the qualification of the hon. Member. The right hon. Gentleman opposite Sir Michael Hicks-Beach succeeded in defeating Her Majesty's Government by the aid of men who had no sympathy with his policy and who repudiated his finance, but who helped him to turn out the Government because they thought that by putting the Tory Party in power they would further the cause which they had at heart. The same considerations operated in the constitutions. With the knowledge of what he would call that deplorable, if not dangerous, feature of their political life, he could not understand how it could be desired to defend, or to perpetuate, legislation from which such deastrous results had followed. He maintained that the Act of Union had really destroyed the Union. It had created ceaseless internecine strife. They had destroyed the Irish Parliament; and now, by a singular Nemesis, the Irish were paralyzing their Parliament. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had truly said we could not remedy that state of things by any alteration of the Rules of Procedure of that House. They might surrender their Parliamentary freedom and their Parliamentary life; but they could not, while the presence of that organized force remained, prevent the weakening of their Parliamentary power, and the arrest of their Constitutional and Parliamentary progress. With reference to the tranquillity of Ireland. In 1886, as in 1800, the main consideration of British statesmen was the preservation of peace and order in Ireland. This present Administration, as well as every other Administration, had found themselves incapable of discharging the elementary duties of government without the assistance of an armed Constabulary unknown in any other part of the Empire, supplemented by a Military Force greater than that by which we defeated Napoleon. Not only that, but these enormous armed forces, as they were told by hon. Gentlemen opposite, must be strengthened and supported by the aid of a coercive legislation utterly unknown in any other part of the Queen's Dominions. Sir Robert Peel, in the zenith of his power, uttered the mournful but memorable words—"Ireland is my difficulty." It was the difficulty of every one of his Predecessors and of every one of his Successors. It was the difficulty of the present Prime Minister; and it would be the difficulty of right hon. Gentlemen opposite if they exchanged sides in the House. And yet, with this accumulated evidence, which no man could gainsay or evade, they were asked by the Representatives of the great Whig Party to rally round the Legislative Union as the essence and kernel of the British Constitution, and the glory of the British Empire. He yielded to no man, not even to his right hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen), in his belief in the wisdom, the advantage, and the necessity of a Union between Great Britain and Ireland; but he objected to be denounced as a Dis-unionist, and to be classed as a Disloyalist, because he raised his voice and gave his vote against a hideous failure which had kindled and fanned the spirit of separation, which had aroused the criminality and the folly of outrage and insurrection, and which, even to-day, calmly contemplated the horrible prospect of civil war. To the arguments which had been used the unanswerable reply was the inexorable logic of facts. The Union had been tried in the balance, and the verdict of English and Irish history, and of the civilized world, was that that Union had been found wanting. Under those circumstances, he asked the House, if the Union was to be preserved, what was desirable, and what was practicable? He agreed with much that had been said as to the intermittent policy which had been pursued. However, the time had now passed for Laodicean lukewarmness. They must either concede frankly, freely, fearlessly, or they must coerce vigorously, sternly, and unflinchingly. The two panaceas could not be combined. They could not walk down both sides of the street at the same time. And in making their choice, forgetting the sad history of the past, and dealing exclusively with the problem as it stood to-day, they had to consider the enormous alteration that had taken place in the condition of Ireland, not only since the Union, but during the last quarter of a century. The legislation of that House had indirectly destroyed the social forces by which the local government in Ireland was previously carried on. The political power of the classes who ruled in Ireland was neutralized, if not swept away, by the disestablishment of the Church and by the two Land Acts. The ascendancy of faith and the ascendancy of property had had their day. They might, indeed, show some fitful ebullitions of their former spirit; but, as a practical power in Irish politics, their day was past and gone. He called that a social revolution. Side by side with that revolution Ireland, as an agricultural country, had been passing through an economic crisis. Land Acts and Land Commissioners might adjust excessive rents caused by the abnormal demand for the occupation of the soil; but no legislation could arrest or alleviate the depreciation in the value of the products of the soil. In addition to this economic change, there had been an organic change. During the last year they had practically effected in Ireland a political revolution by extending the franchise to the people. All these were conditions which were utterly unknown to those statesmen of the 18th century who had been quoted in this debate as authorities binding upon us at the present day. And not only had the conditions in Ireland changed, but the conditions beyond the sea had changed. In the United States, and in Canada, Australia, and almost every other great British Colony, there were many Irishmen and sons of Irishmen whose longest and whose latest memory was the story of the wrongs they themselves and their forefathers had endured on their native soil. [Laughter.] They might laugh; but those Irish people were a numerical, a moral, and a political power, which no American or Colonial statesman, and which, therefore, no British statesman, could afford to despise. Political wisdom and patriotic loyalty must recognize those conditions. He did not wish to indulge in any threats; but these were facts which were confronting this Empire with weakness, danger, and disruption; and he considered that every Englishman was bound, if he could, to put this question entirely outside Party consideration, for it was one of the gravest crises in the history of the British Empire. The Government, in order to effect that, had in the Bill submitted to the House a plan and a principle. At all events, there was this peculiarity about the principle which the Government asked the House to accept. The Irish people perfectly understood it, and they must try in due course to induce the English people also to understand it. That principle was the creation of a Representative Body sitting in Dublin, elected by the people of Ireland for the exclusive control of specifically Irish affairs. If the principle were unsound, no perfection of the machinery could justify its acceptance. On the other hand, if the principle were sound, it claimed acceptance totally irrespective of the details of the measure. The principle was subject to three conditions—the supremacy of the Crown, the unity of the Empire, and the final authority of the Imperial Parliament. As to the first of these conditions, he apprehended there would be little difference of opinion. The Crown was an integral part of the Legislative Body. Its prerogatives were the same with respect to that Body as with respect either to the Imperial Parliament or to any other Legislative Body in the Empire. The controversy raged round the second of these conditions—the unity of the Empire—with which he also associated the authority of the Imperial Parliament. That unity might be disturbed in two ways—either by allowing two separate Legislative Bodies to deal separately with questions of a character with regard to which all the citizens of the Empire had equal rights; or, secondly, by so dividing the Supreme Authority, or, rather, by so subtracting from its influence and power, that it could not utter that united voice and exercise that united action which were the instruments and the symbols of national unity and strength. He had already dealt with the first of these difficulties at the commencement of his speech; and he apprehended that the second objection was met by the reservations and restrictions affecting the Irish Legislative Body. What were the subjects which were specifically reserved, and which the Legislative Body could not touch? They were matters in which Great Britain and Ireland were jointly interested—matters which were of the essence of Imperial existence and Imperial policy—the dignity, the prerogatives, and succession to the Crown; the foreign policy of the Empire, with all its cognate questions of International Law and Political or Commercial Treaties, what, in other words, the Americans called “the Treaty-making power;” the Military Forces of the Empire, land, sea, Volunteers; the control of all arsenals, fortifications, and materials of war; the Colonial policy of the Empire in all its ramifications; the commercial policy of the Empire, comprising not only the items of trade and shipping, and the levying of duties on exports or imports, but the control of the coinage, and protection of copyright and patent property; the Criminal Law of the Empire, so far as it affected the Sovereign Authority, or any attempt to assail its supremacy. These were what were rightly termed Imperial affairs. They constituted the rights and the duties of the Empire; their control admitted of no divided authority; and it was their unity which made and guarded the “One Life, one Flag, one Fleet, one Throne.” So long as the Imperial Parliament retained all authority, all legislation, all expenditure affecting these matters in its own hands, the unity of the Empire could no more be touched by the legislation of an Irish Legislative Body on exclusively Irish affairs than it could be touched by the creation of one Municipality for that Metropolis. There was no doubt but that anxiety was felt with respect to the working of the measure involving certain risks or dangers. One danger arose from the unhappy cleavage which divided the Christianity of Ireland into two hostile camps, and which separated the owners of the soil from those who occupied it. It was too late in the day to waste time in idle recrimination as to who was to blame in these unhappy contests. They existed, and any settlement of Ireland which claimed to be complete or final must recognize their existence; and while it might anticipate a time when those animosities would cease, it must provide for equal justice and protection. The professors of any faith must not, wherever the Queen ruled, be placed at the mercy of the majority. If this principle had been maintained in Ireland, the blackest pages of its history would never have been written. Protestant ascendancy, as embodied in the Irish Establishment—perhaps the saddest parody of Christianity which the history of the Church recorded—had left scars on the social, moral, and national life of Ireland which it would take generations to efface, and the Liberal Party, who swept away that masterpiece of ecclesiastical injustice were bound to prevent any of Her Majesty's subjects being placed at any disadvantage or subjected to any disability on account of their religious faith. This Bill recognized the rights of the minority who held the Protestant faith, and the minority who represented the property and capital of Ireland. If that recognition was incomplete, if the machinery for defending those rights was inadequate, if there was danger, or the possibility of danger, to any man in Ireland on account of what he believed or what he possessed, then those deficiencies must be supplied. His right hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had referred to the financial question, which he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) ventured to say his right hon. Friend had entirely misconceived. His right hon. Friend had stated the net Revenue of Ireland as £7,500,000, and out of that he estimated £4,600,000 as the contribution to the Imperial Exchequer under the present Bill. The actual amount now paid the right hon. Gentleman put at £2,300,000, and even that hon. Members from Ireland considered to be too much, as they contended that their country was over-taxed. Now, in fact, the present Revenue was £8,350,000, and not £7,500,000. Out of that, Ireland cost this country, in Collection and working the Post Office, £834,000. The Irish Civil Charges were £4,010,000. Thus the total Expenditure was £4,844,000, and apparently a balance was left of £3,506,000 as the payment by Ireland to the British Exchequer; but there was to be deducted £1,400,000 paid in Ireland in the first instance, but really paid by the English and Scotch consumers of beer, whisky, and tobacco. Deducting that sum, the real contribution was reduced to £2,106,000. Now, under the new plan how did the figures appear? The gross Revenue appeared as £8,350,000; contribution to the Army, Navy, and other Imperial Charges, £3,242,000, leaving a balance of £5,108,000. Deducting from that £1,000,000 for the Constabulary, he found the spendable income to be £4,108,000. Then the Civil Charges were £2,510,000; the Post Office and Collection, £834,000; and the net balance, £764,000. Out of this had to be provided Ireland's share of the Sinking Fund—namely, £360,000, which brought the surplus down to £404,000; but, again, Ireland was credited with the £1,400,000 really paid by the English and Scotch consumers; thus her net contribution to the Imperial Exchequer was £3,242,000, less £1,400,000, or only £1,842,000, or less than she paid at present—or, putting it in another form, the real tax payment of Ireland, after deducting the £1,400,000, the cost of Collection and the Post Office was £6,116,000. This would be appropriated as follows:—Irish Expenditure—including £1,000,000 for Constabulary—£3,510,000; Imperial "tribute," £1,842,000; Sinking Fund, £360,000; surplus, £404,000—£6,116,000. That financial position was exceedingly good—better than that which we occupied ourselves, and better than any State in Europe and than many English Colonies—and the surplus of £404,000, as compared with the total Revenue, was a very handsome one, and equivalent to a surplus of £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 on our own total Budget of £80,000,000 or £90,000,000. The financial position seemed therefore to be, as he had said, an exceedingly good one, and if expenditure was reduced, as it well might and ought to be, the taxation might also be reduced, and the financial condition of Ireland might become the envy of this country. The other danger was that Irish autonomy was a step towards separation, that it was but an instalment of a demand that would never be satisfied until separation was accomplished, and that it would afford a leverage for advancing and enforcing that demand. That was the argument used against every reform; but he could never see the force of it, and he would not refuse to do a just thing to-day, because he might be asked to do an unjust one to-morrow. He thought the instalment theory was played out; but he told those who believed in it that there were two safeguards and guarantees against separation, which this Bill did not create, and could not destroy. These guarantees were the material interests of Ireland, and the material forces of England. They would have to regard the Irish people as idiots in the last hopeless stage of imbecility if they precipitated that wholesale destruction of property which any attempt at separation would involve. Ireland was exclusively an exporting country. She exported about £20,000,000 worth annually, and of that we took £12,250,000. To destroy her best if not her only customer, she would have to create a Navy, towards which she did not possess—and under this Bill could not obtain one single ship—ready to meet and conquer the greatest Naval Power on the globe. With her barracks and arsenals occupied by the armed Forces of Great Britain, she would have to create an Army, the first step towards which would be a violation of the law, which English force could and would at once put down. There was more than that. Ireland would have to raise a loan, and he wondered what the Stock Exchange of England and America would say to the security—he was not saying anything derogatory of the Irish people—but with Ireland in conflict with England, what would they say to the security? If Ireland ever contemplated separation from England, she would bring about what John Stuart Mill had said would be a disaster to Ireland, and a disgrace to England. The assent of Ireland to separation as an alternative would be an assent to national suicide, and the question, whenever raised, would not be settled by Acts of Parliament, or by Customs' regulations, but—which God forbid!—by the supreme arbitrament of force. He would conclude by asking hon. Members who objected to the Bill, as practical men, to face the realities of the case and say what they meant to do. English legislation for Ireland had been bad, the people of Ireland detested it and rejected it. The conflict might be continued, for it was in the power of the House to do that; but for how long? Every man in the House must know what would be the sure and certain end. The greatest speech perhaps ever delivered in that House—a speech which Mr. Fox said every man should read, and re-read, until it was imprinted on his heart—was the speech of Mr. Burke on conciliation with America. In that superb combination of genius and eloquence and wisdom, the principles for which the Government were now contending were defended with masterly power. Every argument which had been urged against the present concession, and which was then urged against concession to America, was demolished with resistless force. The loyal and patriotic Unions of that day, the advocates of the integrity of the Empire and the supremacy of the Crown, triumphed, and Mr. Burke was defeated by a majority of over 200; but what was the consequence? Why, nine years after that division, England, humiliated and disgraced, assented to a settlement such as Mr. Burke had never contemplated. He Mr. Henry H. Fowler had thought that Englishmen had grown wiser since 1775. They had in their treatment of their own Colonies, in their advice to other European Powers, in their extension of their own electoral limits, declared their belief in Representative Institutions. As a Party, they had emblazoned on their banner, "Trust in the people." Was the Sister Kingdom to have no part or lot in the matter? Were they to be told that Ireland alone of all the Dominions of the Crown, and of all the States of Europe, was not fit for independent self-government? Ireland was, no doubt, in comparison with England, a poor country, poor in minerals, in manufactures, and in commerce; but she was rich in genius, wit, and eloquence, and in her splendid contribution of some of the most illustrious names to the Bede Roll of English history. Irishmen had been sent three times to rule the great India Empire. Some of their foremost Prime Ministers, their most distinguished Lord Chancellors, their most brilliant soldiers, and most accomplished diplomatists, had been Irishmen; and yet there were men of light and leading who laughed to scorn the idea of a Cabinet of Irishmen. They wanted to concentrate and invest the intellectual wealth of Ireland in the Administration of Ireland, and by so doing to weld that nation into closer, deeper, more lasting harmony with their own. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had said he was a Unionist. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) himself reiterated that remark. He was a Unionist; but he was not a believer in a Union which united the Parliaments while dividing the peoples, but rather in one which, while it might divide the Parliaments, would unite the nations. He was not a believer in a Union founded on fraud and maintained by force; but in a Union based on mutual rights, on mutual interests, on mutual respect, and mutual confidence. From such a Union he believed would spring not only the tranquillity of Ireland, but the uniting and knitting together of all hearts, not only in Great Britain and Ireland, but in the Greater Britain and Greater Ireland beyond the seas, in unswerving allegiance to that united Empire which was at once the home and the citadel of those great principles of Constitutional freedom which were the proud and inalienable inheritance of all the subjects of the Queen.

LORD JOHN MANNERS (Leicestershire, E.) said, the eloquent speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down was one which, he was sure, they were all pleased to hear. The hon. Gentleman did not seek refuge in any vague generalities. With regard to the Bill, he advocated its second reading, and gave the House his reasons why he should support the leading characteristics of the Bill. He said that the House should vote for the second reading of the Bill in order to insure the pacification and improvement of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman, in the latter part of his speech, asked the House what it was prepared to do? He (Lord John Manners) ventured to think that the majority were prepared to reject this measure on the second reading. The hon. Gentleman had wound up his speech by a panegyric on Irish statesmen, generals, and Irishmen of light and leading, of whom the hon. Gentleman said all Englishmen were proud. Doubtless all Englishmen were proud of them; but would the hon. Gentleman allow him to ask him what side did they take on this momentous question? Were they in heart and soul with us, or with the right hon. Gentleman opposite? Were these Irishmen who had distinguished themselves in every one of those lines of life to which the hon. Gentleman alluded—were they in his favour on this Home Rule Question or against him and the Government to which he belonged? Let the hon. Gentleman claim, if he could, any one great distinguished living Irishman who was in favour of such a measure as this. At the commencement of his speech the hon. Gentleman contended that the precedent which the Prime Minister had produced the other day for his conduct in asking the House of Commons to give a second reading to a Bill which he intended to withdraw immediately was not a new precedent nor one of a startling character. The hon. Gentleman said that in 1867 the Leader of the Tory Party in the House of Commons introduced a Reform Bill, and on the second reading of that Bill was supported by the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister on the ground that, although he might not agree with all the principal characteristics of that measure, as it would go into Committee and afterwards to a third reading, he saw no reason why he should not support the Bill on the second reading. What a precedent! Did the Government intend to subject this Bill to the ordeal of Committee, and then, if it did not emerge in a satisfactory condition, to give the House of Commons the opportunity of rejecting it on the third reading? The precedent told directly against the hon. Gentleman and not in favour of the position he had assumed. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said that in 1870 Mr.

Disraeli, as Leader of the Opposition, voted for the second reading of the Irish Land Bill, although he objected to certain portions of it. Undoubtedly, Mr. Disraeli did support the second reading of that Bill; but why? He gave the reason to the House, and a very remarkable reason it was, and he would direct the attention of the House to it. Mr. Disraeli said—

“Now, Sir, let me remind the House of what they have probably forgotten—namely, what was proposed in reference to this subject by the Government of 1852, with which I had the honour to be connected. We laid upon the Table of the House four Bills, forming a complete code as regards the land of Ireland. I can describe these four Bills in a sentence. They adopted every recommendation of the Devon Commission. Sir, if those Bills had passed we should not now have been discussing the measure of the right hon. Gentleman. Circumstances, however, occurred which prevented those Bills from passing. There was a change of Government.”

How was that change of Government brought about, and by whom? Mr. Disraeli had laid those four Bills for the reform of land tenure in Ireland in all its principal branches in accordance with the four great recommendations of the Devon Commission, on the Table of the House of Commons; a few months afterwards he had to introduce his Budget. There was great debate on that Budget, and amongst those who took the most vehement and violent part in opposing the Budget, and turning out the Government over it, was the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister. But he did more than that, he not only turned out that Government, but he brought himself into Office. Now, he wanted to ask this question. What steps from 1852, when the right hon. Gentleman came into Office, up to 1870 did he ever take in the direction of reforming the Land Laws of Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman not only prevented the Government that was anxious to do so, and had formulated a great scheme for the reform of the Land Laws, from proceeding with it, but during the whole of that time, in the course of which he was many years in Office, he never stirred hand or foot in the matter till 1870. That was the second precedent which the hon. Gentleman had adduced to justify the unprecedented course of asking the House of Commons to read so momentous a Bill and then withdrawing it; but he

that it formed no precedent for such a proceeding. They came next to consider, as the hon. Gentleman did very frankly, the main features, objects, and provisions of the Bill. After the answer of the Prime Minister this evening they might assume that if this Bill were read a second time it undoubtedly carried with it, in the mind and intention of the Government, the prosecution of the second great measure dealing with the land of Ireland. He hoped the House of Commons would not forget, when it came to decide the second reading of this Bill, that it was virtually deciding the second reading of the Land Purchase Bill as well. Now what, without any circumlocution, was the general purpose and intention of these Bills? The object of the first unquestionably was to hand over the lives, the property, and the liberty of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland to this new Representative Body, and still more, perhaps, to the new Executive in Ireland. That being so, if the Government showed a want of confidence of the manner in which this new Government in Ireland would deal with one great class of the Queen's subjects, as they unquestionably did by the introduction of the Land Purchase Bill, he had to ask what were the provisions and the safeguards in the measure guarding and protecting the other classes who were not to be expropriated or expatriated? The Prime Minister had dealt in the vaguest generalities when speaking of those safeguards. The first safeguard, it appeared, lay in the constitution of the new Legislative Body. Was ever such a constitution invented since the days of the Abbé Siéyès? Twenty-eight Representative Peers, who, as they died out, were to be supplanted by gentlemen who were possessed of £200 a-year. Mr. Gladstone dissented. They hoped Her Majesty's Government would take care that, at any rate, they would be preserved for the purpose of maintaining the rights and vindicating the liberties of the 1,400,000 people who would be left to the protection of the new Parliament. It was perfectly clear that after 30 years the Irish Representative Peers would cease to exist. Whether, in view of their ultimate extinction, the Irish Representative Peers would be found willing to undergo the frightful ordeal of being cooped up in a Chamber absolutely powerless, and subject to all the amenities of debate to which they in that House were not infrequently subject, he left for the House to consider. It was clear that the intention of the Government was that, on the formation of this Legislative and Electoral Body, the Irish Peers should be excluded after a lapse of a certain number of years. What was to be the constitution of the popular Body? Two hundred and four Members were to be elected in accordance with the views of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and they were to be kept in order by the 28 Peers, plus the gentlemen who were elected on the £200 a-year qualification. The scheme was altogether too absurd. The Prime Minister wanted to hear as much as possible of Mr. Burke's views. Just fancy what Burke would have said if he had had to criticize the right hon. Gentleman's proposal to constitute in one Chamber these two marvellous "Orders," who were to form by their junction a protection to the minority in Ireland. Now the scheme of bringing differing Orders together in one Chamber received a very practical illustration in the year 1789 in Paris. They all knew the result of the junction of the Orders in one Chamber at the time of the French Revolution. Mr. Burke had to comment upon the melancholy result of that frightful experiment, and this was what he said—

"In the calling of the States-General of France the first thing that struck me was a great departure from the ancient course. I found the representation for the third estate composed of 600 persons. The were equal in number to the representatives of both the other Orders. If the Orders were to act separately, the number would not, beyond the consideration of the expense, be of much moment. But when it became apparent that the three Orders were to be melted into one the policy and necessary effect of this numerous representation became obvious. A very small desertion from either of the other two Orders must throw the power of both into the hands of the third. In fact, the whole power of the State was soon resolved into that body."

From that they could judge what would be the result of making the two Orders in the Irish Parliament meet in one Chamber. Another of the safeguards on which the supporters of the Bill relied was the agreeable speeches delivered by two or three Members of the Irish Party below the Gangway. He contended that for men responsible for the life, property, and liberty of their fellow-subjects in Ireland to rely upon two or three sugary speeches from those Benches, and to profess unmitigated confidence in those who delivered them, was one of the most lamentable signs of the times. The Gentlemen who made these declarations of confidence seemed to forget the last five years of outrage and violence, which had rendered the history of Ireland a scandal. They appeared to forget that they themselves, good, easy men, were not exposing their own persons, families, or property to those frightful risks. They said—"Look at our noble confidence; see how generous we are; mark the trust we repose in the gallant Irish people." But not one of them, so far as he knew, was risking anything dear to himself; therefore they could afford to play that magnanimous part, and to expose to the risks and hazards of this novel Parliamentary oration the rights and liberties of their Irish fellow-subjects. It was very remarkable that since the first night when the Prime Minister occupied three hours and a-half in explaining the provisions of the measure not a single word with reference to Ulster had fallen from any Member of the Government. Was Ulster to remain in the Bill or was Ulster to be excluded from it? On April 8 the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said—

"There is a counter voice; and I wish to know what is the claim of those by whom that counter voice is spoken, and how much is the scope and allowance we can give them. Certainly, Sir, I cannot allow it to be said that a Protestant minority in Ulster or elsewhere is to rule the question at large for Ireland. I am aware of no Constitutional doctrine tolerable on which such a conclusion could be adopted or justified. But I think that the Protestant minority should have its wishes considered to the utmost practicable extent in any form which they may assume. Various schemes, short of refusing the demand of Ireland at large, have been proposed on behalf of Ulster. One scheme is that Ulster itself, or, perhaps with more appearance of reason, a portion of Ulster, should be excluded from the operation of the Bill we are about to introduce. Another scheme is that a separate autonomy should be provided for Ulster, or for a portion of Ulster. Another scheme is that certain rights with regard to certain subjects—such, for example, as education, and some other subjects—should be reserved and should be placed to a certain extent under the control of the Provincial Councils."

It was plain, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman himself realized the enormous difficulties presented by the position of Ulster. Was any one of the schemes referred to by him to be embodied in the Bill next autumn? If not, what was the position of Ulster to be? If included in the Bill, Ulster would be treated as a conquered Province. So far as Ulster was concerned, this Bill was one of penalties, disabilities, and privations. At the present moment there was no subject discussed in the Imperial Parliament with reference to which the views of Belfast and Ulster could not make itself heard and felt. He referred to such subjects as Commercial Treaties, Conventions like the Suez Canal Convention, the Transvaal War, and the Egyptian Expedition. If the Bill should pass in its present form Ulster would be unable to discuss these questions in the Irish Parliament, and could not discuss them in the Imperial Parliament. The House was told that in the new Bill of next autumn an attempt would be made to open the door a little wider to Irishmen who should wish to take part in the discussion of such questions on this side of the Channel. Well, he understood that a door could be shut or open without causing inconvenience. The Bill as it stood represented the shut door; the Bill, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham Mr. J. Chamberlain would remodel and reconstruct it, would represent the open door; but the new scheme, so far as it had been developed by the Prime Minister, represented the door ajar. Most Gentlemen would have a very distinct recollection of the inconvenience resulting from a door that was continually ajar. There was a terrible creaking, and very unhealthy and disagreeable draughts blew in upon the unfortunate occupants of the apartment. Arguing by analogy, he could not help coming to the conclusion that equally undesirable consequences would follow the right hon. Gentleman's scheme for enabling Irishmen to return to the House of Commons whenever great questions affecting the Empire at large might be under consideration. He was very sceptical about the possibility of drawing a dividing line between those questions which were completely Irish and those which were partly or wholly Imperial. At the commencement of these debates the Prime Minister had said that he had laboured at it, and to invent such a scheme passed the wit of man. Yet now he said a scheme had been framed. As the wit of man had failed, one might assume that the wit of the other sex had found the mode of accomplishing this object, and that some Egeria had come to the assistance of our bewildered and perplexed Numa. He, for one, would await with the greatest anxiety the further development of this new scheme in the Autumn Session. According to the Bill, at the end of 30 years the Irish Peers would not be good enough to send to the Irish Parliament; they were to become extinct; but, then, although not good enough to legislate upon purely Irish matters in Ireland, they were to be kept alive for the purpose of legislating upon Imperial affairs in the English Parliament. Could absurdity go further than that? But how could the scheme work? They were told that the 28 Representative Peers were to come over from Dublin on great Imperial occasions, and that 103 Irish Representatives were to be selected by the Parliament in Dublin to accompany them. Let them imagine the strife and tumult which would arise in the Dublin Assembly when the 204 Gentlemen comprising it should proceed to elect 103 of their number to represent them in the House of Commons. A great deal had been said of late about Grattan's Parliament, and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had declared in a memorable speech that he would only accept a similar Parliament. But this mongrel Assembly which it was proposed to establish in Dublin lacked all the first elements of Grattan's Institution, which was based on the principles of the Resolution passed at Dungannon. That Resolution declared that—

"A claim of any body of men other than the King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland to make laws to bind this Kingdom is unconstitutional, illegal, and a grievance."

Grattan, therefore, insisted on the importance of the "Lords and Commons" of Ireland. But what would be the position of the Lords in the proposed new Parliament? Why, 28 Peers, shut up in a Chamber, were to be outvoted and bullied on every conceivable occasion for 30 years, at the end of which period they would finally disappear. He maintained that the proposed Assembly would bear no real resemblance to Grattan's Parliament, either in its constitution or its functions. If Grattan's

[Eighth Night.]

Parliament, constituted of all the ablest men in Ireland, had not succeeded, what hope could the House of Commons entertain that that Body would perform the great functions which the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were so satisfied that it would perform? He had had access to some interesting letters which passed between his Grandfather and Mr. Pitt, soon after Grattan's Parliament was established. His Grandfather went to Dublin as Lord Lieutenant in 1784. Here was an extract from a letter dated August 15, 1784—

"This city is in a great measure under the dominion and tyranny of the mob. Persons are daily marked out for the operation of tarring and feathering; the magistrates neglect their duty, and none of the rioters (till to-day, when one man was seized in the act) have been taken, while the corps of Volunteers in the neighbourhood seem, as it were, to countenance these outrages."

In June of the same year—he should have read this first—his Grandfather wrote—

"The Northern newspapers take notice of an intention in some of the corps (Volunteers) to address the French King, which they recommend as a very proper and spirited measure. No meeting for such a laudable purpose has yet taken place. I can scarcely believe it, though the madness of some of these armed legislators might go to anything. Were I to indulge a distant speculation I should say that without a union Ireland will not be connected with Great Britain in 20 years longer."

That was a remarkable prophecy, and strictly fulfilled. Grattan's Parliament died of its inherent weakness and its faults. After eight years' experience of his own Parliament, Mr. Grattan said this—

"What has our renewed Constitution as yet produced? A Place Bill? No. A Pension Bill? No. Any great or good measure? No. But a City Police Bill, a Press Bill, a Riot Act, great increase of pensions, 14 new places for Members of Parliament, and a most notorious and corrupt sale of Peerages. Where will all this end?"

That was Mr. Grattan on his own Parliament. Let them carry that a little further. The House of Commons was actually set fire to by the mob in 1793; it was invaded by a tumultuous mob in 1794; it had to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in 1796; it passed the Convention Act in 1797, and Mr. Grattan got so tired of it that he retired from public life for a year or two. Then came the Rebellion of 1798, and exit Grattan's Parliament. That was a short but true

history, he believed, of Grattan's Parliament. The hon. Gentleman who had preceded him uttered a very confident prophecy that if the Parliament had continued to exist it would have passed Roman Catholic Emancipation. That was easy to say, but it was impossible to prove anything of the sort. All they knew was, that Grattan's Parliament went on until it was extinguished after the great and cruel Rebellion of 1798. With respect to the intense eagerness of the Irish people for a repeal of the Union and the passing of this Bill, he could not help thinking that it was a remarkable fact that, so far as they knew, not one single outrage during the last five years on man, woman, or beast, had been perpetrated for the purpose of obtaining repeal of the Union. Every one of those atrocious outrages was committed for the purpose of obtaining somebody else's property, or wreaking personal revenge on somebody who in the exercise of his undoubted civil freedom had committed some act or abstained from some act, and had so brought upon him the vengeance of the murderers and Moonlighters in the country districts. That being so, and the Bill having, as he ventured to think, all the inconveniences, incongruities, and absurdities he and others had ascribed to it, they were asked to go to the second reading. They were told that it was to be a sort of an abstract Resolution to which no effect was to be given this Session, but that in due course there would be a new Bill which they would be called upon to pass. He ventured to think this—that if the House of Commons were beguiled by any considerations of that sort into passing that measure in its present shape, if those Members who objected to all its leading details were beguiled into giving it a second reading, they would find when the autumn came that their position was one of increased difficulty and embarrassment. He alluded to the second Bill, which was inseparably connected with this. His belief was that when the autumn came those Members who voted for the second reading of this Bill—who disliked one Bill and abominated the other—would find when they came into the House that those Bills would be tied round their necks by the autocrat of the Treasury, and that they would very much resemble the condition of the unfortunate burghers of Calais, and it would be more than the ingenuity of Members could effect to extricate themselves from the coil they would find round their legislative necks. No! Those Members of that Imperial House of Commons who believed the principle upon which the Bill was founded to be erroneous, who disliked and condemned many of the leading provisions by which the principle was endeavoured to be put into action, had now an opportunity of expressing that opinion. Surely now was the time for the House of Commons to act. Let the House of Commons rise to the dignity, responsibility, and duty of its position. Let the House of Commons, by refusing the second reading, save Great Britain from shame, humiliation, and disgrace, and Ireland from ruin, confusion, intestine strife, and, it might be, civil war and reconquest.

Mr. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) said, that in deciding this question existing facts must form the basis. They could not revert to the methods of Cromwell and of William III.: Grattan's Parliament was now remote, and they had to consider, not the opinions of Mr. Pitt, but the facts of the case, and it was with facts that they had to deal. They were confronted now with three general propositions under which the problem of Ireland had to be faced. In the first place, there existed in Ireland that sentiment of race which formed an important factor in the settlement of any question of this nature. Secondly, in a country where the land formed the principal means of subsistence, the system of land tenure was an unjust one; and, in the third place, millions of Irishmen had emigrated to the New World, animated by a sense of the wrongs which their country had suffered, and carrying with them a sense of the miseries that had resulted from the British connection. That feeling had not died away under new conditions in the New World, but was handed down to their descendants. In addition, they were now confronted with certain special conditions at the present juncture. In former times Parliament had been composed to a very great extent of landowners or the Representatives of the landowning class; but under the extension of the franchise matters were now very different. Now the actual cultivators of the soil had a direct voice in the management of their own affairs; and, in his opinion, it would be inconsistent and illogical to give them that power and not to take their wishes into account. Among the rural population, and in large towns as well, there was a strong feeling in favour of giving to Ireland those rights to which she was justly entitled, and a feeling that if they acted under the promptings of a sense of justice they would not go far wrong. It was felt that this Irish problem could not be delayed, but must be faced; that it could not be shirked or shelved, but must be settled in one way or another. It was perfectly clear that a step had been taken from which it would be impossible to recede. Under these conditions, it would, in his opinion, be absolutely fatal to delay any further settlement of this question. The Irish people could not be educated into a sense of responsibility until they had the control of their own affairs, and 20 years of coercion would not do that. They had heard much on the subject of guarantees and safeguards in connection with that measure; but he held that the truest guarantee they could have was not one which rested on mere paper or parchment, but which was inscribed on the tablets of the heart of the Irish people, and which would spring from their consciousness that the greatness and the unity of the Empire were indispensable not to Great Britain only, but also to Ireland. They had been told over and over again that if legislative powers were conferred on an Irish Parliament that Parliament would at once proceed to enact a series of confiscations, spoliation, and what not. Those who brought that charge against the Irish Parliament now sought to be established forgot that this was not borne out by history. It was for the opponents of the measure to show that in times past regularly constituted Governments had resorted to spoliation. History, on the contrary, showed that when settled Governments were set up a sense of responsibility induced them to refrain from adopting any such course; and there was no good reason for supposing that an Irish Parliament when created would form any exception to the general rule in that respect. They had been told that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and what was called the unity of the Empire, must be carefully maintained. Members in all parts of the

[Eighth Night.]

House were agreed upon those points; and until a few days ago Gentlemen sitting on his (the Ministerial side) thought that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was put in some jeopardy by the Bill. Although the power to be given to the Irish Legislative Body would be a delegated power, it was pointed out that there would be a practical difficulty in the way of the Imperial Parliament at any time resuming those powers. It was felt that if they were resumed in the absence of the Irish Members it would be grossly unfair towards Ireland; while if they could be resumed only with the consent of the Irish Parliament, then, as the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) had shown, the Imperial Parliament would have parted with a portion of its supremacy so far as one part of the Kingdom was concerned, thus introducing into the Constitution an element of rigidity that was alien to its spirit. Now, however, that dilemma no longer confronted them, but had been completely removed by what had taken place at the Foreign Office last Thursday. They were told that the Irish Members were to be retained at Westminster not only for fiscal but for Imperial purposes. The problem to be solved, when that measure was reintroduced by the Prime Minister, resembled that which was presented by the existing relations between Hungary and Croatia. The Croats had a separate Body which dealt with questions that were specifically and exclusively Croatian, and yet they sent Members to the Hungarian Diet who voted only on matters of common interest. Those matters of common interest were reserved, and formed the subject of debate either at the beginning or the end of each Session. There, therefore, we had a case in which the difficulty that we had to meet had been faced, and to a great extent to the satisfaction of all concerned. Acting in accordance with what he conceived to be the dictates of justice, and also of that expediency which the House never lost sight of, he heartily supported the second reading of that measure.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) said, that there had not been a sufficient raison d'être shown for the Bill. Three points stood out clearly from the mass of arguments for and against that Bill to which they had listened. The first was the justification for the Bill involving motives which had led to its introduction; the second was the security for its provisions, if they were passed, ever being fulfilled; and the third related to whether or not it came up to the final demands of the Irish people. He assured Irish Members below the Gangway that he desired to treat that question in a thoroughly calm and dispassionate spirit. With regard to the justification for that Bill or the motives which had produced it, he had been struck by the fact that the Prime Minister throughout the debates upon it had avoided making any allusion to that powerful organization, the National League, which had been described as the apostolical successor of the Land League. That organization had been the cause of the effect now exhibited in the Bill before the House. He maintained that the movement which had set this scheme in motion had come into existence not from any feeling that justice had to be done to Ireland in order to remedy grievous wrongs that were supposed to have been committed in the past, not from a feeling that the Irish people were entitled to make their own laws, but it was the outcome of the stern necessity imposed upon the country by the voice and the action of the National League. The mandate against the payment of rent and the raising up of the terrible system of "Boycotting" had terrorized, not only the masses in Ireland, but had succeeded in terrorizing the mind of the Prime Minister of England, and had forced him to lay a scheme of legislation before Parliament which must prove dangerous, if not destructive, to the interests of the British Empire. But was it really the case that Ireland was in favour of Home Rule? Was the demand for a Legislative Assembly in Dublin the free and unfettered expression of the Irish people? It was maintained by the advocates of the scheme that the answer was to be found in the fact that 86 out of the 103 Irish Members were returned to Parliament on distinctly Nationalist grounds. But was this result a natural or an artificial one? He did not say that it was artificial, but certainly he did not hesitate to say that it was not entirely natural. If the power of the National League had not hung over every Irish elector at the Election, it was probable that he would not have voted as he did, and that if he had been entirely free no doubt he would have voted otherwise. The uneducated Irish peasant seemed to have voted as he was told by the parish priest and under the domination of the National League. He had been a great deal in Ireland, and had conversed with Irishmen of all classes, and he believed that there was not a man in Ireland who by his industry had become possessed of an independence, however small, and who had anything to lose, who, in his heart, was desirous of Home Rule. He granted that the proletariat and the small mechanic were in favour of Home Rule, and that the small shopkeepers in many cases might cry out for it; but he questioned whether the cry was genuine, and whether it was not the result of a feeling that by opposing the movement their interests might be ruined by the action of the National League. The farmers in Ireland made no cry for Home Rule. All they wanted was to get the land cheap. A great deal had been said in disparagement of Coercion Acts, and of the futility of this kind of legislation; but he wished to point out that coercion was nothing more than the simple insistence of a British Government for the maintenance of law and order in all parts of the United Kingdom alike. As a matter of fact, however, certain classes in Ireland found that agitation paid better than honest industry, and rebellion paid better than both. In order to remedy this state of things, Parliament was asked to establish a Parliament in College Green, or what the Irish Members called the restoration of Grattan's Parliament. He was inclined, however, to think that it would be much more like Tyrconnel's Parliament, which, to the best of his recollection, passed Acts of attainder against Protestants and English landowners. Supposing the Parliament proposed by this Bill were established in Dublin, it seemed to him that the Representatives of the Nationalist Party now or in the future would be subject to wire-pulling by a Council sitting in Chicago or New York. But, assuming that the Irish Nationalist Party were able to cut themselves adrift from the influence of the Party in America, what guarantee had they if the Bill passed that no further concessions would be demanded? The conditions under which the Irish Parliament would be called into existence furnished no adequate guarantees that the authority of the British Parliament would not be impaired. There was no stipulation provided which would be of any practical value; and it must not be forgotten that the forces which sent the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) into Parliament, when the time came for him to bring forward measures of Home Rule for his countrymen, might and would confront him in such a manner as to defy the passing of any laws which civilized communities must require in order to preserve their social and Constitutional existence. He asked whether this scheme of autonomy for Ireland was brought forward by the Prime Minister in the honest conviction that it would cut the Gordian knot of the Irish difficulty, or to suit the exigencies of Party? Was it founded upon the honest conviction that it would restore prosperity to that country, or was it extorted by fear? Was it honestly introduced with the object of preserving law and order in Ireland, or was it a mere capitulation entered into with the object of retaining place and power in England? It had been declared that the Prime Minister entertained no idea of the ultimate separation of the two countries; but who could insure us against the time when it might suit the convenience of the Leaders of the National Party to demand such a separation? In such a case, until that separation was obtained, Ireland might become the camping ground for hostile nations, and the Business of the Imperial Parliament might be brought to a deadlock by the votes of Irish Members. The Irish Party had obtained as their breakfast the disestablishment of the Irish Church. They had now got this Bill for their dinner; and they might demand Separation for their supper. Lord Beaconsfield had declared, many years ago, that Home Rule meant the dismemberment of the United Kingdom, and that those who favoured such a policy were false to their Sovereign and to the country, and might live to lament the disasters which their policy had brought upon the nation. The Prime Minister had held similar language; while in 1873 the Chancellor of the Exchequer had warned the House that governing Ireland according to Irish ideas meant our not governing Ireland at all. The old proverb said that it was only the first step which cost; and that freely translated into Latin meant facilis est descensus Averni. And if they once lent themselves to carrying this Bill it was impossible to predict where they would finally find themselves landed. If Ireland suffered under any real grievances, by all means let them endeavour to remove them; but let them cease to treat her as though she were a nation of children, to be first coerced and then coddled. If Ireland were to be treated on the same lines as England, Scotland, and Wales were, she could have no real cause of complaint. If they were to adopt the wise and prudent policy towards Ireland that he had suggested they might yet see the murky clouds that now environed her lifted and the sun of prosperity and contentment shine over her and illumine with its beneficent rays those who, if left alone, were a warm-hearted and a loyal people.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I am not one who has taken up the cry of Home Rule recently; but one who, since I have had a beard on my chin, have advocated the right for the Irish people which I, as an Englishman, claim for my own country—the right of self-government. There may have been sudden conversions on the side of the House from which I speak; but you must remember that sudden conversions are not necessarily false ones. St. Paul was converted suddenly, but his conversion was real; and it is idle to suppose that, before he saw the light from above, he had not many searchings of heart. Although there have been sudden conversions on this side of the House—the conversion, for instance, of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, doubtless, by-the-bye, will be able to explain the process by which he has arrived at his present position of mind—I want hon. Gentlemen opposite, in fairness, to believe that there are a very large number of Members in this quarter of the House, some who were in the last Parliament, but, notably, many who have come into this Parliament, who hold the Democratic view, and believe that peoples everywhere have the Divine right to govern themselves, and to shape their own destinies. If I have been struck with one thing in this debate more than by another, it has not been with the change of opinion I have heard expressed by some hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House. I admit that it is rather remarkable; but more remarkable still has been the reticence of right hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House. Some here may have changed their views; but my difficulty is to know what is the real opinion of those who lead the Tory Party? I think the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) especially might be called upon to state in this debate what his views are. I notice that he seems to look on and observe the duel on this side of the House. If I might do so without offence, I would compare him to Iago, and recall a very remarkable scene in the play of Othello. I can imagine the noble Lord peeping from behind the Speaker's Chair, and, whilst he observes the Roderigo of West Birmingham proceeding to make his onslaught upon the Cassio of Mid Lothian, saying to himself—

“Now, whether he kill Cassio,
Or Cassio him, or each do kill the other,
Every way makes my gain.”

[Cheers.] I beseech hon. Members who sit behind the noble Lord to be chary with their cheers when he addresses the House. They will make a mistake if they bestow too much confidence upon him. You tell us on this side of the House that the Prime Minister converts us, and leads us in ways we do not wish to go; but I have no complaint with hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am not going to say a single word that will give offence to one of them, because, if the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary do not carry this Home Rule Bill, as is very likely, owing to the action of Roderigo, the noble Lord is the man in whom I place my confidence. The Tory Party is the Party which will do the great thing the Liberals failed to do. Therefore, it is with especial regret I look upon the action of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington). I would not in this House say one word disrespectful to the views and the character and the conduct of the noble Marquess. He is a Whig of the pure type. I am a Radical of the dangerous type; but I respect the noble Marquess. I have honoured him ever since I entered this House; and,

although I can seldom follow him, I commend the dignity and honesty with which he supports every view he puts before the House. I deplore the position in which he is about to be put in regard to this Home Rule Bill. I know what is going to happen. There have been so many prophets that I venture to prophesy. I prophesy that if the acts of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), the Radical Member, result in the defeat of the Bill which contains the very essential principle of Radicalism, the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale and his Whig Friends will see, as we have seen three or four times in this century, the Tory Party allied to the Radical Party, and reinforced by the Irish Party, carrying a Bill after all. Now, as the question has been approached in half-a-dozen different ways, I should like the House to permit me to put before it in 20 or 30 sentences the point of view from which a Radical looks at this question of Home Rule. I was particularly struck by the generous words in which the Prime Minister excepted the people of Scotland from any charge that they were concerned in the evil government of Ireland in the past. I freely admit it; but I wish the right hon. Gentleman had gone a little further. I wish he had generously added—as I think he would if he had thought of it—that the English people neither have a right to be charged with complicity in the nefarious Acts by which Ireland was bound to England in this unholy union, and by which she has been mismanaged for so many years. If any part of this Kingdom is to be charged with the evils of the past, it cannot be the common people. They had no power until 1867. In 1867 half of them gained power, and the first use they made of their power was to hold out the right hand of fellowship to the people of Ireland. Since 1885 the whole people of the country have had power; and as they have had no complicity in the misgovernment of the past, so I, one of themselves, the Representative of a Democratic constituency, say that the people of England—the common people—have no will, no inclination, no interest in perpetuating a state of things under which Ireland feels bound to act in antagonism to England; but, on the government for the people; Turkey coercing Bulgaria, the Divine right of self-contrary, as Englishmen, believing that they would resist to the death every attempt to misgovern them, or to govern them against their will, so they will give to another nation—their brothers in blood and in heart—the same right to govern themselves as they enjoy. Why is it I propound this Radical doctrine? For three reasons. First of all, because I admit that we have misgoverned Ireland in the past. Nobody denies it. There is not a Member who dare rise on that side of the House and say that we have governed Ireland well. We have mismanaged Ireland. There are people who look with a light heart at the matter; but, in my opinion, the historian, the impartial historian—not the historians who write nowadays in the daily newspapers, but the impartial historian of the future—who comes to write the history of the connection between England and Ireland in the 19th century, will not point out the petty details which hon. Members opposite occupy themselves with, but will write in broad characters this damning accusation against England—"A diminished population, languishing industries, ruined agriculture, the people in heart and soul opposed to yourselves," he will say; "this is the record the English have made in 86 years of government." That, Sir, will be our condemnation. But it is not merely when I look at Ireland I claim for her this right to self-government. Common shame makes me do it. Common shame ought to make every Radical do it, and it ought to make the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham do it. I do not speak to the Conservatives in the House, or the Whigs either. ["Hear, hear!"] I hope hon. Members will not think I mean to be disrespectful. If I am to speak to anyone at all, I would rather speak to those who, I think, are going astray, than to those who are, I think, consistently following their own principles. I admit hon. Members opposite are consistently following their own principles, and I would rather speak to erring brothers on this side of the House. Now, look at what we have done. There is not a country in Europe, where the people have sought this right of self-government, but we Radicals have supported it. If it was Russia coercing Poland, the Divine right of self-government for the people; Austria coercing Italy, the Divine right of self-government for the people; but when it comes to England governing Ireland, not as Ireland wants, but as England wants, then we seem to forget our principles and deal out to the Irish people a very different meed to what we deal to those at a distance. There has been one exception to this; I allude, of course, to the case of America. I have never heard during the course of this debate the case of America fairly quoted; but I will put before the House my case if you, Sir, will permit me. In the case of America the argument was this. The people of the Northern States, by force, compelled the people in the Southern States to remain in the Union. What I want to know is, What was the Union? What is the Union between England and Ireland? What was the Union between England and America? Thirteen Sovereign States met, and after solemn argument and prayer bound themselves in solemn bond that they would stand together. But how did we obtain the Union with Ireland? Not with prayer, but bribes; not with argument, but base corruption. If the Irish people wish to withdraw from that Union, we have no moral right—we may have the right of force—to stop them. If these people make a solemn bond with us, binding themselves and the two nations, then, but not till then, our moral right exists. I have heard in this House declarations that we can compel the people of Ireland to stand to this Union. I say as an Englishman, knowing my own people in the North—hard-headed, clear-minded men—that although they would hold the Irish to any bond they might enter into, they entirely revolt against the idea that they should use the sword to compel the carrying out of the present Union. It is no Union of which we can be proud. It is no Union in the eyes of the civilized world; and, therefore, I say it is time that this base and unworthy Union should be done away with, and that there should be substituted for it a Union which, in my judgment, will bind the two nations together more closely than they have been bound together before. I do not object to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite opposing this measure; but I should like to ask the House, how can any Radical oppose it?

Mr. Storer

The very essence of the Radical creed is that a country should be allowed to govern itself; and yet we have Radicals in this House opposing this measure, and proposing some sort of plans of their own. I have not yet ascertained positively what those plans are; but, whatever they are, they seem to err in one particular point; they never seem to consider the Irish people as a people, or to imagine that Irishmen have hearts and souls of their own. The Radical Leader, as he is called, does not seem to think that Irishmen are to be treated as men of flesh and blood. He seems to think that they are so many manufactured articles, to be disposed of at so much a dozen, a heavy discount being allowed if the business be intrusted to him; and, therefore, he objects to the plan put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and I understand he is going into the Lobby against him. I have got a quotation here, and I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is not here to enjoy it, for I should like him to recollect what he said in September, 1885. He said—

“Two million voters, hitherto silent and unheard, will now demand attention, and the claims which they make, and the rights upon which they insist, will be an important factor in our future legislation. The programme which satisfied a limited electorate is much too restricted for the new constituencies. This has even attracted the attention of the ‘Stupid Party.’”

I beg hon. Gentlemen opposite to understand that these are not my words. I should address them much more respectfully. These are the words of their trusted ally. Let me resume the quotation—

“They based their hopes—that is the Tory Party—on the expectation of differences in our ranks, of a great secession from the Liberal camp. I do not think there are any of us who will be tempted to desert our old camp in order to make new political allies with that heterogeneous combination which includes Free Traders and Protectionists, Ulster Orangemen and English Roman Catholics, Licensed Victuallers and Established Churchmen, Tory Democrats and Fossil Reactionaries, all uniting their discordant voices in order to form a mutual protection society, and for assuring to each other place, privilege, and power.”

Sir, after that quotation, I do not wonder that the noble Marquess at the head of the Tory Party (the Marquess of Salisbury) said he would use the right hon. Gentleman, but he would not trust him.

I do not want to say any more about the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; but I wish him to consider—no doubt he has considered, he does nothing without consideration—to consider what he is going to defeat this Bill for, in support of what policy is he going to give his vote? I am not going to explain that policy at any length. Twenty years of coercion the noble Marquess promised us. “No, no!” Well, then, I will substitute an Elizabethan euphemism, and say a Government firm and stable—a firm Government by those who, in the face of a General Election, dare not renew the Coercion Act. I have been in the House only some four or five years; but I have seen enough sitting here, and seldom speaking, watching hon. Gentlemen, and especially right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench, long enough to know that whatever else we may look for—and I look for many things from them—I do not look for a Government firm and stable. Nor do I look for it from any Government on that side of the House or this. No; not till we get a Radical Government. Hon. Members entirely misapprehend the Radicals of this country; they are firm, and they will find that out when the Radicals come into power. The noble Marquess, if he did not ask for 20 years of coercion, at any rate proposed that £150,000,000 should be spent in deporting 1,000,000 Irishmen. “No, no!” Well, I am unfortunate. I cannot please hon. Members when I quote what was said. I will put it in another way. He said he would not propose it, yet the money would be better spent in that way. “Hear, hear!” Oh, I am glad I am right this time. Then here it is I join issue with hon. Gentlemen and with the noble Marquess. I would rather spend £150,000,000 in any way in the world than in deporting the sons of toil from either this country or Ireland. I deplore the aristocratic offensiveness of the proposal. Speaking as a son of the poor, there is nothing I object to more than that any one Marquess, or anyone else, should make the deportation of 1,000,000 of men from their native country a high question of State. If there must be deportation, I can tell you a much better way of spending the money. A shipload of Marquesses, a few Earls thrown in, as many Barons, especially the newly-made ones. In that way if we spent £150,000,000 we might get a good return: but of the men who work and make the wealth of the country, I tell the noble Marquess and all those who agree with him, we will keep as many in the country as possible. I have very little more to say; I thank the House for listening to me so long. I want hon. Members opposite just to realize the fact that what we feel, what I feel, speaking for myself and my constituents—and I feel I can speak on this matter for my constituents—I only wish that all my hon. Friends on this side of the House could honestly say the same—speaking for myself and my constituency, we feel this—we do not want separation from Ireland; we do not want to injure by one jot or tittle the great fabric of the British Empire; but we want union with the Irish people by agreement and by affection. We deplore the circumstances of the past 86 years; we think they have brought harm to Ireland; we are sure they have brought shame to England. We say the time has come for a new state of things; and we believe that in the proposals of the Prime Minister for giving Irishmen the management of their own affairs we have proposals that will bring peace between the two countries. For 86 years Ireland has protested against this state of things. Up to 1829 inarticulately, from 1829 to 1885 semi-articulately, and since 1885 with the articulate voice of a great people. I say we are bound to listen to the voice of these Gentlemen, who represent Ireland. I know all the time I am speaking—at least, I think so—that when the division on this Bill is called, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government and his supporters will be in a minority. [“No, no!”] I say I think so; and, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but recall the analogy between now and 100 years ago. That analogy has been referred to in eloquent terms by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton Mr. Henry H. Fowler in his magnificent speech; but I will just refer to it again in a word or two. A hundred years ago there was a great Minister, venerable, venerated, potent—like the right hon. Gentleman who is at the head of the Government now; not even the voice of faction could say of that great Minister of 100 years ago that he was not patriotic, and did not love his country, for in the darkest days of her misery and degradation the elder Pitt took hold of her fortunes when her soldiers were flying from the enemy, when her ships were driven from the seas, and when her spirit failed within her. He, by the magic power of his patriotic soul, brought England to the height of her fortunes, and delivered her from all her enemies. He was a patriot, and he loved his country, did this great Minister. In his old age, and when tottering on the verge of the grave, there was a great question—as there is a great question now—of the right of an English-speaking people over the sea to govern themselves according to their own ideas; and this patriot Minister, the great-souled Chatham, in his old age proposed to Parliament some such measure of conciliation and justice as the Prime Minister proposes now. Then the Whigs and Tories—aye, not the Tories alone—the Whigs, ever faithful to their tradition of giving as little reform as will suit the petty circumstances of the time—the Whigs and Tories of the time united to defeat the Minister and his Bill. His Bill was defeated, and the Minister passed into his grave. Within a few brief years, the time for conciliation having passed, the English-speaking race over the sea asserted by arms its right to that self-government God means a people should have; their efforts succeeded, and England was degraded. It will be an evil omen if, after 100 years, the miserable experience of that time should be repeated by a British Parliament now. Happily, there is one difference between 1776 and 1886. In 1776 the common people of the country had no power; they were but carriages drawn by the power or will of their own politically aristocratic steam engine; they had no Now it is different. If the verdict of this House—a verdict of a heterogeneous Party of Tories, Whigs, and so-called Radicals—if a verdict here should defeat the Bill, repeating the blinded course taken by Parliament 100 years ago, then I trust the Prime Minister will appeal from the House to the country; and sure I am—it may be not the first time nor the second time, it may not be by these hands, but at some time not far off, and by one Party or the other—the right of the Irish people to manage Irish affairs on their own soil will be conceded by the Parliament of Great Britain.

MR. MACNAGHTEN (Antrim, N.): I am sure that every Member of this House is desirous that this debate should close without unnecessary delay. The Bill is practically dead. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; it is dead, and buried too. The debate has sunk into a hollow discussion upon a measure which will never appear again in the same form; and even if it should re-appear it is very doubtful whether it would be accompanied by the measure which the Prime Minister has declared to be an inseparable part of his great scheme. Under these circumstances, I think that any ordinary Member who intrudes in the debate owes an apology to the House. My apology and my excuse are that the views of a large body of Irishmen, of whom I am one, have not been laid before the House, at any rate by one of themselves. I am not an Orangeman nor am I a Nationalist. And if I may venture to say so, I do not agree in the estimate which each of these Parties passes upon the action of the other. If I may say so without offence to Orangemen, I cannot deny to the Nationalists the possession of patriotic motives; and I am certainly unable to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell) in the statement that the utterances of the Orangemen are mere bluster and brag, and that they are nothing but the tools of their superiors. The Orangemen are a very independent body, jealous, and properly jealous, of interference. They are, in fact, the democracy of the Protestant element, and are quite capable of directing their own actions. Still, I am bound to say that I do not agree with the violent language which some members of that Party have used; and I desire to avoid, as far as I can, giving offence either to the Orangemen or to the Nationalists. But I wish, as an Irishman, to state what my objections to this Bill are. I object to it on two grounds—in the first place, because it appears to me to place Ireland in a very degraded and humiliating position; and, secondly, because it opens the door to absolute separation and independence. These two arguments are contradictory, as the hon. and learned Attorney General said the other night; but that is not my fault.

The Bill itself is contradictory. I have tried to understand it as well as I could. I have read it over and over again; and I think I have listened to everything that has been said about it. Whether the Government have thrown as much light upon it as they could I do not know. I rather think they have not, because I observe that, at the historic meeting held at the Foreign Office, a young and artless Member of the Party rose and begged the Prime Minister not to commit himself at that stage to any definite statement which might hamper him later on in the year in the framing of a new Bill. That seemed to me to be a most extraordinary request to make of the Prime Minister. I think the hon. Member cannot have studied the speeches of the Prime Minister with the same care that I have done. Did the Prime Minister ever commit himself to any statement? But the right hon. Gentleman was equal to the occasion. With admirable gravity, he thanked his youthful adviser and promised he would follow his advice. I think the most suspicious and most sceptical of the Tory Party will believe that the Prime Minister will religiously keep that promise. With the Bill before the House, and such statements as the Government have vouchsafed—definite or indefinite—in regard to it, one thing is clear. It has been said over and over again. This is a Parliamentary contract, or a Parliamentary compact. Now, I am not aware that there is any difference between a contract and a compact; but I have always thought it was essential in any contract or compact that the terms should be clear, precise, and definite. That is not the belief of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Chief Secretary said that this was not a "cast iron Bill;" and what he prided himself most of all on in the measure is its adaptability. His words were that he prided himself most of all on its "flexibility of adaptation." That notion of flexibility of adaptation is greatly in favour with some of the Party opposite. I think the House was very much enlightened the other day by a speech from the Treasury Bench, in which a Member of the Government said that he had always thought that in advocating Liberal politics he was supporting a Party who were prepared to alter their policy "as frequently as circumstances demanded."

That was the language of a young Member of the Government; but you do not learn the secrets of the Party from "an old Parliamentary hand." I think the Chief Secretary was right in claiming "flexibility," the governing principle of the Liberal Party opposite, as the leading feature of this Bill. To my mind it is a very novel and very dangerous idea to have a compact vague and flexible. I think I can retort on the Chief Secretary that we in Ireland are not fools or children, and I say—"Tell us exactly what you are binding us to." Nothing is so dangerous, and so likely to lead to quarrels and bickerings, as a vague and flexible compact. I have said that I object to the Bill, because it is likely to lead to the degradation of Ireland. Let me leave out for a moment the flexible quality of the Bill, and let us see what it is the Bill really purports to concede to Ireland. We have often heard hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway say that they would not be satisfied with anything less than Grattan's Parliament. We all know what Grattan's Parliament was. It was as near independence as it could possibly be. But does this Bill concede Grattan's Parliament, or anything like Grattan's Parliament? What is more, does it concede a Parliament at all? Why, we were told that the other night in the speech which the Secretary to the Treasury praised so deservedly to-night. The hon. and learned Member for Wisbech Mr. Rigby is a great Constitutional lawyer, and he told us that this Body the Government propose to create is not a Parliament; that there cannot be two Parliaments; and this is not a Parliament at all, but a Legislative Body, just like a Local Board, or a parcel of Judges meeting to devise rules under the Judicature Act. The hon. and learned Member for Wisbech went on to combat the very admirable arguments of the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs Mr. Finlay, and, commenting on some of his observations with regard to the omission of the clauses in the Colonial and Indian Acts which had been referred to, said that there was nothing in it, but that the clause, if not expressed in the Bill, was plainly understood. Well, I do not venture to differ from the hon. and learned Member. He is a Member of my own Profession, and a great Constitutional authority. Hon.

Members opposite, commenting on the arguments of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, always say that there is nothing in them; and here they say that, although that clause is not in the Bill, it is plainly understood. But do hon. Members below the Gangway know what the clause is. Let me read it to them. It is this, only substituting "Ireland" for "the Colonies," and "Irish" for "Colonial"—

"Any Irish law which is or shall in any respect be repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to Ireland shall be read subject to such Act, and shall to the extent of such repugnance, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative."

[ "Hear, hear!" ] Hon. Members below the Gangway say "Hear, hear." Do they know where they are? The Act of George I., which has been before referred to, contained two clauses, and two clauses only—one was, that the Kingdom of Ireland should be subordinate to the Kingdom of Great Britain, and that the King and Parliament of Great Britain could make laws which were to bind Ireland; and the other was to the effect that the English House of Lords should be supreme over all actions at law in Ireland. That Act was so obnoxious, so hateful, to the Irish people that they almost rose in rebellion, and Grattan's Parliament was the result; and yet this Bill is actually re-enacting both of those clauses—one you will find in Clause 36, and the other the hon. and learned Member for Wisbech tells us is understood, though not expressed. That I think is a very degrading and humiliating position. But it does not stop there. Irishmen are forbidden to legislate about many things—for instance, about trade. But trade is the one thing which, if Ireland has a Parliament of her own, we are told she will try to revive. They are forbidden to legislate about foreign politics. The hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay) says that in a certain class of foreign politics which create difficulties with England the people of Ireland have always taken a deep interest; and he instanced the exploits of the Mahdi. I will make a more pleasing reference. I have myself a clear recollection that one or two hon. Members sitting below the Gangway have taken a very lively interest in the affairs of India, and their interference has been of public service.

Mr. Macnaghten

But all that is to be changed. I was astonished to hear the Secretary to the Treasury say to-night that Irishmen may not even discuss these matters. I do not find that in the Bill. Why, these matters are discussed at almost every Board of Poor Law Guardians in Ireland; and yet the Legislative Body of Ireland is to sit mute, and if an hon. Member happens to rise and refer to any of them, I suppose the Irish Speaker would call him to Order, and say that he was trespassing on very dangerous ground. I say that that is a degrading and humiliating position, and while you are pretending and making believe to concede Grattan's Parliament, what you are really doing is to restore the state of things which Grattan's Parliament was intended to do away with. You are creating a Body which will be more fettered and hampered than the Irish Parliament which preceded Grattan's Parliament, and which was restricted by Poyning's Act and the Statute of George I. That is my first objection to the Bill. My second objection to the Bill is that it opens the door to separation. That is due to this very element of flexibility. I have shown, I think, how different this Bill is from what the Irish people have been led to expect. The result will be that when these limitations and restrictions are recognized, and thoroughly understood in Ireland, the feeling of discontent created by the Act of George I. will be produced by this Act. And then some new Leader may arise—possibly one of the hon. Members who sit below the Gangway, or, if they find themselves so fettered by the declarations they have made, it may be some other and some younger patriot, who will say, in words we all remember, that "No man has a right to fix the boundary to the march of a nation." And then he will try to evade the Act, and for a time he will be the most popular man in Ireland. Will it be difficult to evade this Act? I am prepared to say that any man could easily drive a coach and six through almost every section of this Bill. Take one case—take the case of the Volunteers. Ireland would be prohibited from legislating on that subject. But there may be Volunteers without any legal enactment. As far as I know, the old Irish Volunteers did not owe their existence to statute; and what has been before may be again. If troublesome times come, and there was a war with France or America, a body of Volunteers would be an awkward factor if the Irish people became dissatisfied with this Act. It is said there may be Volunteers; but how are you to pay them, and how are you to arm them? I do not think there would be much difficulty about that. We all know what enormous subscriptions have come within the last few years from America to Ireland to forward the cause of Irish independence, and I cannot help thinking that what has happened already may happen again. But I take leave to say that over and above that there is nothing whatever in the Bill which would prevent the Irish Legislature from devoting taxes raised in Ireland to the payment and equipment of Volunteers. And so it is with regard to trade. The new Body is to be forbidden to legislate upon, or even, if the Secretary of the Treasury is right, to discuss, questions of trade. I cannot think he is right about that, but it may be so. But I do say there is nothing in the Bill which would prevent the Irish Parliament from giving bounties to Irish industries, if they desired to drive English trade from the country. It is said that Ireland would be bound by the statutory contract into which by this Bill she would enter, or England should recall the boon. That might be so, if we knew what the terms of the contract really were; but that is the very thing we do not know. If the terms of the contract were definite and found within the four corners of the Bill, I could understand a person saying—"You have overstepped the limit, and must take care what you do." But what this Bill does is this—it says—"You must not legislate with regard to certain things; but with regard to all the rest you may be as free as air." If that is so—if it is so flexible—where are you to draw the line, or to say that an Irish patriot is overstepping due limits? I can understand what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the time may come when it would be necessary to reconquer the country with "the unanimous voice of a united people, and the consenting conscience of the civilized world." I think we should have some difficulty in getting the unanimous voice of a united people, or the consenting conscience of the civilized world. I can understand that, however; but I cannot understand how the abiding sense of England's greatness can keep Ireland within the strict limits of its duty. It has never done so yet. The Prime Minister once said to Lord Spencer, and Lord Spencer has repeated the observation, that England could do what she liked with Ireland—that she could drag Ireland behind her as a mighty man-of-war drags through the sea a little eight-oared boat.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Meaning, if England were in the right.

MR. MACNAGHTEN: Yes; but who is to be the judge of that? It would be all very well if there were a supreme arbitrator to whom we could have recourse. The Prime Minister may depend upon this—that a very different view of what is right would be taken in Ireland from that taken in England. For the last 86 years England had been doing what she thought right in Ireland; but during a great part of that time, and certainly during the last few years, Ireland has said that England has been doing wrong. Who is to decide between the two? Even now, at the last moment, the Prime Minister comes forward and says that Ireland has been right and England wrong. That is not what he said a few years ago. I have heard him in this very House say that he was pursuing the path of justice, and that in the end what was just would prevail. Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear! I am glad the right hon. Gentleman agrees to that. But has it turned out so? Has the path which the right hon. Gentleman has pursued pacified Ireland; if so, what is the meaning of this Bill? Upon that ground, and upon these two points, I object to the Bill as an Irishman; but, as an Ulster man, I have a special objection to it. I have a special objection to the inclusion of Ulster in the Bill. Whether, in the result, the Prime Minister has determined to include Ulster or not I do not know. As far as I could gather from his speech when he introduced the Bill, he left somewhat uncertain the question whether or not Ulster is to be included; but the recent utterances of the Treasury Bench lead me to the conclusion that the Bill is to include Ulster. We have heard the subject discussed with rather a light heart by my hon. and learned

[Eighth Night.]

Friend the Attorney General, who has said that he is an Ulster man himself—and so he is, and in Ulster we are very proud of him, and whether we agree with him in political views or not we are all delighted at the success which he has obtained at the English Bar and in this House; but there is one thing for which I do pity the Attorney General, and it is this—that in ignorance of this Bill and of the blessing which it will confer upon Ireland, and upon Ulster in particular, he should have transferred his home and his fortunes to England. That is an error which I am sure the hon. and learned Attorney General will be anxious to repair; and if this Bill were to pass I think the only difficulty the hon. and learned Gentleman would have would arise from the profusion of choice at his disposal in selecting a residence in Ireland. I must say, however, that, in the meantime, the opinion of the Attorney General would have had more weight with me had he selected for his home—as I have done—Antrim instead of Surrey. The hon. and learned Gentleman greatly amused the House by reading certain foolish speeches which were delivered by Irishmen at the time of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. Whether that was worthy of the hon. and learned Gentleman I do not care to inquire; but he read some extracts with great dramatic power, and made very amusing comments upon them. As to threatening to die, that, I am sorry to say, is in Ireland a common form. The Irish Volunteers were always threatening to die in the field; and I can assure the House that the Orangemen have no monopoly whatever of this noble desire for death. The desire is equally common, and, perhaps, even more wholesale, among hon. Members below the Gangway. I find that the hon. Member for North Fermanagh (Mr. W. Redmond) has used the most alarming expressions. The hon. Member has said that he “would never raise his voice upon any platform except to proclaim that Constitutional means might fail, and if they did fail it was the duty of every Irishman to look into his heart and see whether he was prepared to do and die under the green flag.”

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon; but I should like to know the date of that speech, in order that I may know whether that was the occasion on which I was referring to the doctrine laid down by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill).

MR. MACNAGHTEN: I think I can satisfy the hon. Gentleman. The date of the speech was the 24th of May, 1885, which was before the noble Lord had spoken upon the subject; and, therefore, the hon. Member must have been the original.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then the noble Lord appears to have followed me.

MR. MACNAGHTEN: It may be that it was in order to prevent such a general catastrophe that the Prime Minister has brought in this Bill. Returning to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded to argue that the opposition to the Bill in Ulster was not serious, inasmuch as similar expressions had been used by Ulstermen at the time of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, and nothing came of them. But, Sir, the two cases are not parallel in the slightest degree. At that time the Presbyterians, who have been justly called the right arm of Protestantism in Ireland, supported the Prime Minister in his proposal for disestablishing the Irish Church. At that time the only persons who felt any deep resentment at the proposal were the members of the Established Church. The Presbyterians, who form the largest body of Protestants in Ireland, either stood aloof or supported the measure, and the Dissenters were altogether indifferent. Now, however, things are entirely changed. Now the Presbyterians of the North of Ireland are united with the members of the Disestablished Church. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but I can assure him that, with some very trifling exceptions, which really are not worth mentioning, the whole Protestant Body of the North of Ireland are united against this measure. Well, I think the consequences may therefore be very serious, and in this way—If this Bill is passed, capital will, undoubtedly, to a very large extent, be withdrawn from Belfast, and a large number of persons will necessarily be thrown out of work; and if those persons feel that their want of employment is due to this measure, and if the whole Protestant Body in that part of Ireland are found to be united, I venture to think that the consequences may be very serious indeed. I do not think that it is consistent with either the highest form of statesmanship, or with good sense, to argue that because nothing followed upon the foolish things which were said under one set of circumstances, therefore nothing would follow upon things said now, when the circumstances are entirely and absolutely different. Those who take the optimist view of the matter have asserted that this measure will not affect Belfast. But are hon. Members aware how it has affected Belfast already? The fear of the passing of this measure has already so affected that city, that trade and business have come to a standstill; no man buys goods unless he sees exactly when and to whom he can sell them; and I have been informed by a gentleman on whom I can entirely rely that the absolute loss, in the depreciation of local securities, has already reached £1,000,000 sterling. Now, I should like to know why Ulster should be included in this measure? It is said that the measure has been brought in because the people of Ireland decline to be bound by laws which come to them with a foreign aspect and in a foreign garb. But the Imperial laws have never worn a foreign garb or aspect in the eyes of the people of Ulster; whereas, if our laws are to be made by the Nationalist Party in Dublin, they will most certainly come in a foreign garb and aspect to us. Belfast has nothing in common with Dublin. Belfast is bound up with Liverpool and the thriving Lancashire towns, and also with Glasgow; but with Dublin it has little or no concern. Now, there is one thing which has rather pleased me in the course of this debate, and that is that hon. Members below the Gangway are beginning to disparage us very much. They say that Ulster is neither prosperous nor well-conducted; that Belfast has not increased since the Union; and that, in point of fact, they can get on well without us. Then why do they want to include us in this measure? Somebody has said that the sober common sense with which we are sometimes credited might be of use; but the hon. and learned Member for South Londonderry (Mr. T. M. Healy) has, I think, disposed entirely of that argument. I heard him the other night challenge comparison between the Members who sit on those Benches and the Conservative Members for Ireland; and I am bound to say, with the unanimous applause of those who sit beside him, he decided the issue entirely in his own favour. I am not going to quarrel with the hon. and learned Member for that; I should be very sorry to place myself in any comparison with him. I am very glad to find that even that reason for the Bill has been cut away. We have, certainly, the gravest apprehensions, and are those apprehensions without foundation? In the first place, I should like to know what the Government are going to do with the Land Bill, which they say is an inseparable part of this measure? I can only make a passing allusion to it. As it is referred to in the Bill I suppose I may say one word about it. Now, the Members of the Government who have spoken upon that subject are Lord Spencer, Lord Ripon, and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and what they say is remarkable. Lord Spencer says that all the Members of the Cabinet are agreed upon it, and that it was a mistake to suppose that he had any peculiarly strong views upon the subject himself. The noble Lord said further that for the peace of Ireland, for the good government of Ireland, this question must be settled by the Imperial Parliament, and not left to the new Body; that it would be too great a strain upon them; that it is too enormous a burden to throw upon the legislation of a young and untried Legislature that will have enormous difficulties of its own to cope with. Lord Spencer added—"There will be no peace in Ireland if the Land Question is not settled." After that declaration—that there will be no peace till the Land Question is settled—are you going to leave that question out? If these views of the Government are correct, are there not some grounds of apprehension? Then there is another matter, and I think a very serious matter to all persons who have property, and to all persons who are engaged in business, and that is the way in which the Government have dealt with the Judges of Ireland. Certainly, this is the oddest

thing I ever came across. The Prime Minister said—

"Some of these Judges, by no fault of their own, have been placed in relations more or less uneasy, with peculiar influences, and what, under the new Constitution, will in all probability be the dominating influence in that country."

And then the proposal is made for hustling the Judges out of the country. That proposal is so grotesque and so extraordinary that, for my part, I may be pardoned for thinking the Prime Minister was not serious about it. My own mind turned to a Chief Justice who, in Shakespeare, had placed himself in uneasy relations with the coming Sovereign; and I could not help thinking that this was a piece of by-play arranged between the Prime Minister and his new allies for the purpose of inaugurating this new era of peace and conciliation with proper dramatic effect. The Prime Minister's words, speaking on behalf of his Parnellite allies, are almost a copy of the words used in regard to the Chief Justice to whom I have alluded—

What! rate, rebuke, and roughly sent to prison

The immediate heir of Ireland! Was this easy?

May this be wash'd in Lethe, and forgotten?"

And then I thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), or, perhaps, the hon. and learned Member for South Londonderry (Mr. T. M. Healy), would take up his part, and would consider what these Judges had really done, and would be able to say—

"You are right;

Therefore still bear the balance and the sword.
With this remembrance,—that you use the same

With the like bold, just, and impartial spirit,
As you have done 'gainst us."

If the hon. and learned Member had taken up the Prime Minister's challenge in that spirit he might have gone on to say they had come—

"To mock the expectation of the world;
To frustrate prophecies; and to raze out
Rotten opinion, who hath writ us down
After my seeming."

But the hon. and learned Member was not equal to the occasion. The hon. and learned Member the other day received the Prime Minister into his favour as a father welcomes back a prodigal son.

Mr. Macnaghten

He greeted him with the homage of lips unaccustomed to flatter and the choicest passages of the Hebrew Prophets. He has forgiven the people of England centuries of wrong; but the hon. and learned Member draws the line at the Irish Judges. He has no forgiveness for them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not say a word about them.

MR. MACNAGHTEN: I beg the hon. and learned Member's pardon. I am in the recollection of the House. I heard him—and I heard him with deep regret—only the other night, refer in very uncomplimentary terms to Mr. Justice Lawson, and I must say that I was much surprised that no Member of the Treasury Bench rose to repudiate the hon. and learned Member's allegations. I know that Mr. Justice Lawson is a good lawyer, and I believe him to be an honest and upright Judge. I do say that it is a very alarming thing to us that the Judges of Ireland, in whom we have confidence, and who have acted fairly, justly, and impartially, although they may have given offence to some persons in the exercise of their duty, should be replaced by a completely new set of officials open to new influences. Passing from that, we are told that we ought to trust the Irish people. Well, I would trust them as far as a man may. It is said that a sense of responsibility will make them just and considerate, and endow them with every virtue under Heaven. I should have more confidence in the success of the experiment if those who recommend it were themselves about to undergo it. And I must say, also, that I should have more confidence in its success if it could be proved that in any one single instance—I do not say they have not—if it could be proved that in any one single instance up to the present time hon. Members below the Gangway had interfered to suppress outrage and "Boycotting." I do not say that they have not done so; but there is no proof that they have. I can understand that, when their power was growing, it might have been too much to hope that they would interfere to suppress and put down and destroy that which was the very source of their power; but why did they not interfere when their power was established? There is one case which has created a very painful feeling in the North of Ireland—that of the City of Cork Steam Packet Company. The “Boycotting” of that Company is one of the most alarming incidents, so far as trade and commerce are concerned, that has occurred in recent years. The war—if I may call it war—with that Company began on October 7, when the power of hon. Members below the Gangway was completely established; and no one could doubt that they were about to come back to this House with at least 80 or 90 Members. They might then have interfered; and I am sure that the slightest word from them would have stopped the outrage at the outset. The Steam Packet Company were subject to the laws which regulate the rights and duties of common carriers, and were bound to convey anybody's goods. Unfortunately for themselves, they carried the goods of some persons who had made themselves obnoxious to the National League. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: How?] The hon. and learned Member asks me how. I did not try the case. Let the hon. and learned Member, who is in the secrets of that Court, say how it was that the Company gave offence to the National League.

MR. PYNE (Waterford, W.): I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. and learned Member is in Order in saying that the Company, in which I am a shareholder—namely, the Cattle Association—had not the right, as well as any other trading Association, to start a Company to carry cattle if they so desire?

MR. MACNAGHTEN: I think the hon. Member is a little mixed. Whether the hon. Member belongs to the Company that was “Boycotted,” or to the Company started with the object of ruining it, I do not know. I do not wish to go further into the case than to say that the fact remains that the Cork Steam Packet Company were “Boycotted,” and that their trade was ruined through the influence of the National League. Then what did they do? They employed their vessels to carry coals. But the National League sent out bands of music to the wharves, and forbade the landing of the cargoes. A peace has now been patched up, but upon what terms? For two months the Cork Steam Packet Company have to carry free cargoes for the persons who have done their best to ruin them, and then at half rates for two months more.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Perhaps the hon. and learned Member will allow me to interrupt him. [Cries of “Order!”] I wish to say that for the last three or four years I have been intimately associated with the National League as its Secretary, and I never had a word to say as to the dispute between the cattle trade and the Cork Steam Packet Company. It was purely a question between the Cattle Trade Association and the Cork Steam Packet Company. The National League never interfered in the matter.

MR. MACNAGHTEN: If the National League never interfered actively, these things were done under its cover and sanction. [“No, no!”] Then, am I to understand that things have come to this pass in Cork, that, even where the League does not interfere, persons are afraid to carry on their legitimate business? Sir, I will pass from that. I have said nothing about the religious question involved, and I desire to say nothing on that subject; but, as everybody knows, there is a strong feeling in Ulster. It may be wholly unfounded. Perhaps the Catholics never did persecute; but I say there is a strong feeling on the subject in Ulster, and I do not think it can be entirely disregarded, and especially when we bear in mind that this Bill is founded on sentiment and sentiment only. Is it too much to expect that you should pay some regard to the feelings of the people of Ulster, even though they be sentimental, and not founded on good reasons as you think? There is one other argument, and only one, to which I will refer. It is said that we ought to have faith, and that we ought to have confidence in the declarations of public men. One hon. Member said—and said, I have no doubt, with truth—that the words which the hon. and learned Member for South Londonderry used on a late occasion came from the heart. I do not doubt it for a moment. I am not questioning the sincerity of hon. Members below the Gangway. I give them absolute credit for sincerity; but I am bound to say—and I say it with something like shame—that recent events in this country have done a great deal to shake confidence in the permanence of the declarations of public men. I am not going into particular cases; but I am perfectly certain that, in their own hearts, both the Secretary of State for War and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will agree with me. I am deeply obliged to the House for the kindness and attention with which it has listened to me, and I have only one or two words more to say. I would ask hon. Members now, before this Bill passes, to look forward and to consider what may happen supposing that it does pass. What will be the first thing that will occur in Ireland? Why, it will be welcomed with extravagant joy. There will be a delirium of excitement; and the humblest Member who may have assisted in passing it will be welcomed with the homage denied to the Heir to the Throne. What will be the next thing? After that will come the distribution of the spoil; and the spoil will be greater than any spoil that was ever at the disposal of the Executive of any civilized country at one and the same time. To the victors, of course, the spoil will belong. Next, after that, will be a measure to provide for the payment of Members—I do not say that that would not be perfectly proper—and then the trade of the politician and the vocation of the patriot will be the most lucrative profession in Ireland. Well, you cannot get on in a profession if you sit still and do nothing. And these new patriots—I am quite satisfied the old ones will do nothing of the kind—but these new patriots will take Grattan's advice—and who can blame them?—they will go on, as Grattan said, knocking at the Union, or so much of the Union as is left, and they will recall all the wild and extravagant words used by hon. Members below the Gangway and their supporters during the last few years. They will recall those expressions I mentioned just now about fixing the boundary to the march of a nation, and dying under the green flag. They will begin by asking if these Gentlemen have acted on those principles, and if they have really given them Grattan's Parliament, and then there will come something like discontent; people will be surprised that credit does not grow up in one night like Aladdin's palace, and that trade has not revived as a matter of course. Then there may come a famine; famines recur in Ireland. Then there will be disturbances, rash words, and rash deeds.

Mr. Macnaghten

Then, possibly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer may interfere; but I think the end will be less tragic and more commonplace. I think the new Irish Constitution may end in universal bankruptcy and a regular smash. This is what you ask us—what the prosperous, law-abiding, and hard-working people of Ulster are asked to take part in—I assure you they desire nothing but to be left alone. You will not let us alone—is it too late to appeal to the common sense of the people, and to the teachings of history? Sir, I think it is not. We appeal to Scotland, and we appeal to England. Already one Scotch Member has given a response, and has in manly and eloquent terms declared that Scotland, Presbyterian Scotland, will never coerce Ulster men who are united to them in blood and religion. And, Sir, I do not despair of England. I trust the people of England—I trust the democracy of England. Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people.

MR. DWYER GRAY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I am astonished that the hon. and learned Member for North Antrim (Mr. Macnaghten) in his speech, which otherwise, so far as we are concerned, was of an inoffensive character, should have thought it necessary to introduce into it the suggestion that we are advocating this measure for the sake of procuring payment for the Irish Members in the new Legislative Body. I take it that if we are actuated by any motive of that kind it would be a very much better speculation for us to remain where we are; because I imagine the question of the payment of Members is likely to arise as speedily in the Imperial Parliament as it is in an Irish Parliament, and the remuneration here is likely to be of a very much more substantial character. The hon. Member alluded to the speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General, and while paying to the hon. and learned Gentleman a tribute of praise, he expressed a hope that he would transfer his services and his residence to Ireland when the new Legislative Body is established; but, at the same time, to a certain extent, he sneered at what he called the lightness and levity with which he said the hon. and learned Attorney General had treated a serious subject. Perhaps I may be permitted to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman, who himself occupies a distinguished position at the English Chancery Bar, that he can also transfer his exceedingly valuable services to the Irish Bar, when this change shall have been accomplished, and then the levity and light-heartedness of the hon. and learned Attorney General will be counterbalanced and prevented from assuming an undue preponderance by the solidity of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed the House. The hon. and learned Member has alluded to the Cork cattle trade dispute, and he has led the House to believe that the action of the Cork Cattle Association was instigated by the National League. Now, I think the hon. Member ought to have endeavoured to make himself master of the facts before he made a statement calculated to prejudice the National League, and a large number of Irish Members connected with that organization in the eyes of the House. The fact is that the dispute was of a purely local character. The National League not only had nothing to do with it, but refused to have anything to do with it. It was essentially a trade dispute, carried on with vigour on both sides; but not stained by any of those excesses which frequently accompany trade disputes both in England and Scotland. It was a dispute between those interested in the regular cattle trade on the one hand, and those who had endeavoured to set up a trade competition to the detriment of that trade on the other, and after a struggle of a few months an amicable compromise was arrived at, not on account of extreme compulsion on either side, but a compromise brought about by mutual friends, and arranged to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned. If that is the most formidable accusation the hon. and learned Member has to make against the popular organization in Ireland, and if that is his sole ground for apprehending that, by this Bill, trade will be destroyed in Ireland, and that there will be general bankruptcy and a universal smash, then I think all sensible men will say that there is very little ground for the exaggerated fears the hon. and learned Member has expressed—fears which I venture to think in his own secret heart he does not entertain. These accusations against the popular Party in Ireland, of their desire to destroy trade in Ireland, and drag down commercial enterprise, are not at all confined to the hon. and learned Member. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen) in his place, and I would scarcely have ventured to intervene in this debate if it were not that I desired to reply to an attack made by the right hon. Gentleman upon me in his speech on the first reading of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman in that speech quoted an extract—an extract which I venture to say did not convey the true meaning of the article, but which, no doubt, was supplied to him probably by the agents of the Loyal and Patriotic Union—he quoted an extract from an article in a newspaper owned by me, The Morning News, published in Belfast—and he pointedly alluded to the fact that it was owned by me—which contained a suggestion inimical to the linen trade. That extract struck the House as being very extraordinary in a newspaper owned by me. I did not exactly recollect at the moment what that article could be, or how it could have got into any newspaper over which I had any control. I have since looked into the facts, and if the right hon. Gentleman desires to verify my statement, and wishes to allude to the subject in his speech, which I think I am almost entitled to ask him to do, I will forward him the series of articles on which he can form his judgment. In 1881 the linen trade of Ulster was in a state of extreme depression, and the Ulster Association, which represents all the manufacturing industry in flax in the North of Ireland, published a very lugubrious Report, pointing out the extreme depression of trade, and the fact that the area of flax under cultivation had been falling off from year to year, until it had reached a very low point indeed compared with what it was 10 or 20 years before. It had decreased from 380,000 acres in 1864 to something like 80,000 acres in 1881. I read the Report, and I was greatly struck with the figures it contained, and also with the fact that many of the flax mills were closed; that many limited companies had ceased to pay any dividends; and that their shares had ceased to be marketable, and were only quoted at nominal figures, although the shares were fully paid up. I was also struck by the fact that many of the gentlemen who had been interested in the flax trade had failed, and that their mills were closed. I thought it was a good thing to investigate for my newspaper the cause of this lamentable condition of affairs. I asked a gentleman interested in the linen trade of Belfast, whose sole means of livelihood was the linen trade, who was, 20 or 25 years ago, engaged in the trade, and who was extremely competent to deal with the subject, to write a series of articles in The Belfast Morning News on The Decline in the Linen Trade: Its Cause and its Remedy. These articles were not intended to depreciate the linen trade, but were rather an independent attempt to investigate the causes which have led to the depression in the trade, and to make suggestions which might help towards its revival. These articles were written in a very independent tone, which may have been liable to misinterpretation. The article to which the right hon. Member referred was an allusion made by the writer to a speech made by a gentleman in America regarding the fact that the Belfast merchants had "Boycotted" the Dublin Exhibition, and what an effect it might have on the resuscitation of the linen trade and on public opinion, and more especially on Irish public opinion. He warned the people of Belfast that such narrow-minded conduct was not calculated to enlist Irish support in America. I am speaking in the presence of many hon. Gentlemen in whose faces I saw indignation when the quotation was read. These are, however, the facts of the case. The article excited a certain amount of controversy, and did good. I venture to say that if the right hon. Gentleman will peruse the whole series of articles, which I will forward to him, I am sure, with that spirit of justice and impartiality which is his great characteristic, he will withdraw or qualify the most injurious suggestions he made, doubtless because he had only received a garbled extract from a long series of articles. The right hon. Gentleman staked his great authority in this House upon the financial aspect, founded, no doubt, on certain figures supplied to him, I presume, from the same tainted source. [Mr. GOSCHEN: No.] The right hon. Gentleman says "No." That only makes the matter worse; because, if he knew the whole of the facts, he only quoted a portion of them, and quoted figures calculated to mislead the House. Some of the figures may have been mentioned before in this debate; but in view of the emphasis which has been placed on the question of Ulster by the hon. and learned Member for North Antrim (Mr. Macnaghten) it is important to go into them again, and I crave the indulgence of the House while I do so. The right hon. Gentleman said that if Ulster were separated from the rest of Ireland, Ireland would be unable financially to carry on the work of Government. To prove this, he took Schedule D of the Income Tax, which deals alone with trade profit and professions. He compared, on that single Schedule, Ulster with the remainder of Ireland; but he said that from that calculation of the income from trades and professions the City of Dublin, the capital of Ireland, must be excluded. Upon that extraordinary calculation, he arrived at the conclusion that the Nationalist portion of Ulster only contributes some £300,000 under Schedule D of the Income Tax, while the non-Nationalist portion of Ulster contributes £2,500,000, I think. But will the right hon. Gentleman be astonished to hear that of that £2,500,000 he attributes to the non-Nationalist part of Ulster £2,100,000 comes from the town of Belfast. Therefore, if you exclude Dublin on the one hand, and Belfast on the other, this enormous preponderance under Schedule D disappears at once. Surely it is the merest folly to take the one great town in the South out of the calculation of the Income Tax derived from trades and professions, and to leave in the great town in the North, and then compare the two. There is a much fairer method of calculating the matter, and I will ask the House to consider it for a moment. I have taken the assessment for the Income Tax in an agricultural county not under the single Schedule of trades and professions, but under the whole four Schedules into which Income Tax is divided; and the result of that is that in the three Southern Provinces the assessment is £24,000,000, while in the Northern Province it is only £9,900,000. That is a very different comparison indeed from that which was made by the right hon. Gentleman; and I trust that when he comes to deal in his speech with the question of Ulster again, he will take some general statistics which will give him a fair notion of the comparative wealth of the different portions of the country, and that he will not take one particular Schedule, leaving out one portion of the trades and professions of the country and including another, by which means it is only possible to arrive at an erroneous conclusion. Now, the Income Tax per head for Leinster is £10 6s. 9d.; while in Ulster it is only £5 14s. 5d. per head. That gives a very different notion of the comparative wealth of the North and South from that given by the right hon. Gentleman. But even in despised Munster it is £6 0s. 7d. per head, as against £5 14s. 5d.; and these figures prove where the wealth, as well as the intelligence, of the country is concentrated. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) procured a Return of the rateable value of property in Ireland, and this affords a fair criterion also. The result is exactly the same. Leinster stands valued at the rate of £3 13s. 5d. per head of the population; Munster £2 10s. 10d.; Ulster £2 9s. 11d.; and Connaught £1 15s. 2d.—that is to say, that Ulster stands lower than either Leinster or Munster. It is constantly dinned into our ears that Ulster is wealthy and prosperous, and that we represent the three impoverished Provinces, and want to seize upon Ulster because she is prosperous. But, as a matter of fact, so far as the rateable valuation is concerned, only one of the four Provinces stands lower than Ulster, and that is Connaught. The other two are rated at a higher figure. So that in neither the assessment for Income Tax, nor in the valuation for rateable property, does any Ulster county stand amongst the first 14 in Ireland. Therefore, no hon. Gentleman will, I think, venture to cite facts to bear out the assertion that it is because the other parts of Ireland are so impoverished and Ulster so prosperous that we want to have a central authority, instead of having the country cut up into districts. The Income Tax in Leinster, excluding Dublin, is £7 16s. 6d.; while if you leave Belfast out of the calculation for Ulster the valuation is only £5 1s. 0d. Turn the figures as you please, if you take them fairly you will find that the views so persistently put forward are fallacious. It will be found that Ulster does not occupy anything approaching the position of supremacy claimed for it by its friends. Another test by which the comparative wealth and prosperity of Ulster and the other portions of Ireland may be ascertained is the test of emigration. Emigration is the index of poverty and of discontent; and yet, as proved by the figures for 10 years, will the House be astonished to learn that emigration from Ulster has been higher than from any other part of Ireland? In 10 years down to 1881 the emigration from Ulster was 5.38 of the population; Munster, 5.26; Leinster, 4.68; and Connaught, 3.59. Thus the emigration from Ulster was not very far from double what it was from Connaught. I take it that there are fair methods of seeing if Ulster is contented and prosperous; but hon. Gentlemen who are always proclaiming the wealth, contentment, and loyalty of Ulster, never adduce facts and figures. I should like to know what right the hon. and learned Member for Antrim has to speak on behalf of Ulster at all? Hon. Members above the Gangway speak of themselves as Ulster Members; but why do not these Members remind the House that they are a minority even from Ulster? If the representation from Ulster is divided between the Nationalists and the so-called Loyalists, it will be found that the real Loyalists—the Nationalists—are in a considerable majority—a majority of some 20 or 25, and quite sufficient to constitute a working majority in regard to the Business of this House. Is it not astounding—I do not wish to be offensive—but is it not something approaching to impudence for hon. Members from what is called the "Imperial and Loyalist Province," although in a minority, to be perpetually telling us what Ulster will do and what Ulster thinks? If the House wants to know what Ulster will do and think, they will have to turn to these Benches to know, for we are the majority, expressing the Constitutionally-expressed opinion of Ulster. We are perpetually reminded of what the Protestants of Ulster will do, and what they will not do; of what yoke they will submit to, and what steps they will take to resist the edicts of this House by force of arms. They are continually speaking of Protestant Ulster as if Ulster is Protestant as a whole. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) seems always to have fixed in his head the notion that Ulster is essentially Protestant, and he is much concerned to defend Protestant Ulster against being put under the yoke of the Catholics. He was not always so concerned for them. It is worth while to examine with a little care the pretensions of Ulster to be called Protestant Ulster, and to see how little right there is to that claim. As a matter of fact, the Catholics of Ulster enormously outnumber any denomination of Protestants in Ulster; and it is only by combining the other denominations in Ulster that you can secure a small percentage of Protestants over the Catholics. Even with all these denominations—Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Unitarians, Independents, Moravians, and Jews—and bulking them as one, you only get 52 per cent of non-Catholics who are not homogeneous in any sense, and 48 per cent of Catholics. It is only in four counties in Ulster, out of nine, that Protestants are in a majority at all. In the majority of the counties of Ulster the Catholics are in a majority in returning Members to this House numerically in five out of nine counties; and when hon. Members, without any justification, speak on behalf of Ulster, they speak of the four counties of Armagh, Antrim, Down, and Londonderry, because in those counties alone are they in a majority. If you eliminate Belfast, the Catholics are in a majority in the remainder of Ulster over all other denominations combined. I take it that the warlike pronouncement of which we have heard so much, and to which an evening paper devoted five pages the other evening, is not so much to be afraid of, or to alarm hon. Members; but even if there was anything in these warlike sounds, the fact that, take Belfast away, there is a majority of Catholics over Protestants of some 80,000 over every other denomination may make us feel not quite so much alarm. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), in a speech which he made some time ago in England, said that Ulster, tried by every test of wealth, education, and the comfortable dwellings of the people, would not be found wanting. I have already examined the test of wealth and education; let me try the matter now by the test of the dwellings of the people, as we are challenged to do by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Let me take the case of dwellings of £1 and under—the worst class of hovels to be found—we find in Ulster 152,499; Connaught 105,008; Munster 92,632, and Leinster 85,040—that is to say, that in wealthy Ulster, in regard to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman challenges this test of the dwellings of the people, there are more than one-third of the whole number of the worst class of houses valued at £1 and under, and nearly double as many as in Leinster or Munster, and 50,000 more than in Connaught. Therefore, I am afraid that, taken even by that standard, Ulster has very little to boast of. But let me go from the worst class of houses to those of the very best class—namely, those rated above £12, and what are the facts there? In Leinster there are 18,745; Ulster 11,950; Munster 6,598, and in Connaught 2,452; so that neither tested by the worst nor the best class of houses does Ulster reach that point of perfection which we are continually told she has long ago attained. I therefore hope that hon. Members above the Gangway who may continue this debate will cease to speak either of Ulster as essentially Protestant, or as monopolizing the wealth and intelligence of the country. These figures ought to be a lesson to those who still presume on the ignorance of English public opinion to talk in this manner of what they call “Loyal and Protestant Ulster.” The Dublin Evening Mail is the ostensible organ of the Orange Party in Dublin and in the South of Ireland. It is an organ of the strongest and most pronounced Tory principles. It has always fearlessly advocated those principles; but it is not without a certain amount of intelligence, and, on occasions, a certain amount of frankness. Writing, within the last fortnight, of these statistics, which had been published in another Irish newspaper, it deprecated the practice of speaking of Ulster as a single homogeneous Province, and suggested that Ulster ought to be divided into what it says should be “Celtic Ulster” and “British Ulster.” It gave a list of the nine Ulster counties, and went on to say—

“The first four of these counties—that is Down, Antrim, Armagh, and Derry—constitute what we call British Ulster; but the title of Derry to that name is precarious."

Therefore, the Orange Tory organ in Dublin acknowledges that only four of these nine counties have any pretension to be called "British Ulster," and that the title even of one of the four is precarious. The article goes on to say—

"It is not merely in the interests of abstract truth or of convenience of nomenclature that we wish to discard the notion of Ulster being a homogeneous Province, a political unit, having as good a title as all Ireland to pronounce on its own political destiny. The pretended unity of Ulster is a danger to the cause of British Ulster. The Nationalists have the wit to see this, and are now parading the majority of one which their side obtained in Ulster at the late General Election as an argument for treating Ulster as a whole, and that whole Nationalist."

That is exactly what the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) wants the House to do. But the Orange organ in Dublin tells us it would be dangerous to do what the right hon. Member for West Birmingham proposes to do. The writer goes on to say—

"We apprehend that if Mr. Gladstone succeeds in kindling a civil war in Ireland, a good many counties in Ulster will stand in for the College Green Parliament, and their share of whatever plunder is going."

So that, whenever an appeal is made to the right hon. Gentleman to say what he will do for Ulster, and if he proposes to exclude Ulster from the Bill, the appeal must be made on behalf of three counties only which have a decided claim to be called Protestant; and I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would seriously stand up in this House and propose that 29 counties should be included under one national Representative Body or Council and the three Orange counties left out? If hon. Members above the Gangway will study these figures, I think they will see that they altogether dispose of their right to speak on behalf of Ulster, or to talk of "Protestant Ulster." Not a single Member who has taken part in this debate has attempted to deny these facts, or the natural deductions to be drawn from them. I have many more figures; but I am aware that the reading of dry statistics is very irksome to hon. Members who have to listen to them. I have endeavoured to show that Ulster has no special claim to be called wealthy, as compared with the rest of Ireland, or to be called exclusively or mainly Protestant. But we are told that all the intelligence of Ireland is concentrated in Ulster—that it embodies not only the wealth but the intelligence of Ireland. An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear! An hon. Member says "Hear, hear;" but I will leave the House to judge for itself. It would be most indecorous and presumptuous for me to express any opinion upon that subject, although I may have formed an opinion in my own mind. I will take a more legitimate test, the test of the percentage of persons able to read and write. I do not find that, judged even by that test, Ulster possesses that predominant position in regard to intelligence which is claimed for it, both in and out of this House. The number of persons who can neither read nor write were, according to the last Census Returns, in Leinster 58.5; Ulster 53.4; and Munster, where, of course, all the stupidity and ignorance are concentrated, 53.2, or practically the same as Ulster; and Connaught 41.5. Thus we have the fact that judged by the standard of education, Leinster is higher than Ulster. We have not been much astonished at the attitude taken by the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington). His action has been at least straightforward and open from the beginning. He has been a fair opponent, and we have towards him, although an opponent, nothing but feelings of respect. But I confess the attitude of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) has been a standing puzzle to me for some months. It is a matter of extreme difficulty to ascertain exactly what the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman are on this subject of Ireland on any given day. We know that, in 1874, he was a Home Ruler, and that he was then an advocate of the federal scheme of Mr. Butt; but more recently, in publications which, although not given to the world with his name, yet bear his imprimatur, and which, I think, he will not venture to repudiate, he discussed the system of federation, and had very strong faith in it as a settlement of the Irish Question. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN dissented.] I see the right hon. Gentleman shakes his head.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W. : If the hon. Gentleman

wishes to know why I shook my head I will tell him. I understood him to say that in some article supposed to have my approval, I spoke in favour of federation as a possible solution of the question. I assure him that he is mistaken. In that article I pointed out—in that article it was pointed out—[Laughter and ironical cheers—hon. Members are really a little too hasty. As I have already stated in this House, that article was not written by me; but in that article, the general lines of which I am ready to say I approved, it was stated that federation would be a solution quite consistent with the unity of the Empire, and the attribution of large powers of local government to Ireland; but it was pointed out that it would involve so great a disturbance of the English Constitution that at that time it was outside the range of practical politics.

MR. DWYER GRAY: I understand, then, from the right hon. Gentleman that although he did not write that article, he is willing to take the responsibility for it. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN dissented.] At all events, the Press of the United Kingdom attributed it to the right hon. Gentleman. When it appeared to be a popular article, and perhaps when it was assumed that it might contain the germ of a solution of the Irish Question, the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly ready to take credit for it. There was not a newspaper in the Kingdom which did not publish a statement that the article was that of the right hon. Gentleman, and contained his plan; and it was published in the Radical programme, which, I believe, the right hon. Gentleman ignores also. Am I also to understand that the right hon. Gentleman repudiates the second article in The Fortnightly Review? I take the silence of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the second article as his assent to my assumption that he is, at least, responsible for the second article. In the second article occurs this sentence—

“In the first place, there is the proposal for National Councils, which was put forward with the authority of Mr. Chamberlain in the pages of this Review, July, 1885.”

So now we have this condition of affairs—that in 1885 the article was published with the authority of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: The statement that the proposal for National Councils was put forward with my authority is perfectly correct; but that does not make me responsible for the whole of the article, which was not written by me.

MR. DWYER GRAY: The House will understand the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman. But we are in this position. The article was published in July, 1885, which contained a scheme for the solution of the Irish Question; every newspaper attributed it, if not to the pen, at least to the inspiration, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; during 18 months the right hon. Gentleman took every credit for that article; he never, in speech, or paper, or by any other means, denied that he was responsible for that article. He was responsible for an article published this year in the same magazine; the article published this year stated that the article of the previous year was published on the authority of Mr. Chamberlain. The right hon. Gentleman never denied that; but now he comes forward and says he is not responsible for it. The right hon. Gentleman, who has no difficulty in writing contradictions to the Press when it suits him, was in this case unable to write a letter of two lines to remove the belief, which we are now told is a misapprehension, that he was responsible for the article of last year containing a scheme for the solution of the Irish Question. I do not wonder that the right hon. Gentleman is willing to shift from himself a portion of the scheme of the article of July, 1885, because one of the strongest objections which he has to the scheme of the Prime Minister is on account of the two Orders, and the dual system of representation. The right hon. Gentleman alleged that this was not sufficiently Radical for him—it contains the principles of representation of property, and of the two Orders—but in the scheme of July, 1885, these principles were embodied. Whoever the mysterious and undiscoverable author of the article of July, 1885, was, he proposes that upon the County Boards there should be representatives of owners of property distinct from, and elected in a different manner from, the representatives of occupiers; and he proposed to carry on that dual system. Thus we have embodied in the scheme the principle of the two Orders, which we are now told is sufficiently Radical to be in the Radical programme. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will tell us when he makes his speech, which we are all looking forward to with so much interest, what is his present opinion upon this question of dual representation, and whether he withdraws now from that portion of the scheme in the article which he does not deny is his own, and which The Fortnightly Review referred to as being published last year on the authority of Mr. Chamberlain. Now the right hon. Gentleman interrupted me to say that in the authorized document of this year, in contradistinction from the unauthorized programme of last year, when he was criticizing the various proposals, including that of National Councils, he was not opposed to the principle of federalism, and that he thought there might be in it the foundation of a system which would grant to Ireland sufficient rights of self-government, while maintaining the unity of the Empire. I have nothing to say against the system of federalism; no one, however, has grappled with the argument of the Prime Minister, or has shown how the objections which the right hon. Gentleman urged against that scheme are to be met. But in view of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has no objection to federalism, and that he thought that in it might be found a solution of the Irish difficulty, it is a matter of some interest to know how he asserts that the principle of federalism would work. I do not know what are the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman upon the question of a Republic; but there was a time when he professed Republican principles. He has not, as far as I know, publicly repudiated his Republican doctrines; and he may, therefore, be assumed to have still certain Republican leanings or proclivities, modified possibly, to a certain extent, by the oath he has since taken; but, as I have said, he has never publicly withdrawn, or in any way repudiated, the notions of a Republican form of Government, of which, for years, he declared himself to be the advocate. Now, the article of this year shows the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman as to how the system of federalism would work. I will quote one sentence from it, which is very significant in face of the determination which he has announced to vote against this Bill, as showing the opinions which he held at that time, whether they were or were not acceptable to the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman said in the article in The Fortnightly Review of February, 1886—

“It would be needless to impose benefits which would be scornfully rejected by those for whose advantage they were intended. Once more, in the history of Irish politics, we have to register the verdict—‘Too late.’”

I take it that the right hon. Gentleman is going to do his best next Thursday, or when the division is taken, to register another verdict of the kind. But the chief point to which I desire to direct the attention of the House is the way in which the system of federalism would work out. The right hon. Gentleman said it should be adopted not only with reference to Ireland, but with reference to the rest of the Kingdom; he suggested two Legislatures, one for the three Southern Provinces of Ireland and one for Ulster; he went on to suggest that there might be similar Legislative Bodies for England, Scotland, Wales, and the Isle of Man—at any rate, he made out there would be six Legislative Bodies. The article says—

“There would be, therefore, six Legislatures, each with its separate Ministry, and it may be assumed with a single Chamber.”

In this, perhaps, some Radicals may find a solution of the most extraordinary attitude which the right hon. Gentleman has taken up; it may be that he is far more Radical, and that his schemes are more far-reaching, than anyone has an idea of. “In any case,” he goes on to say, “the House of Lords, as at present constituted, must be abolished.” I commend that to the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale, who has recently entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with the right hon. Gentleman, who, in former times, scarcely spoke of him with so much confidence as at present—

“And it is hardly conceivable that even the nominal authority of the Crown could be long preserved.”

That is the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman as to the ultimate effect of a scheme of federation, and in that, he says, alone is to be found the solution of the Irish Question. I think I am not wrong in saying that the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to the question of Republic versus Monarchy, is true to the principles of his earlier days, and that he has declared publicly that the Crown ought to be abolished—perhaps with the substitution of the right hon. Gentleman as Lord Protector. I do not know whether, following the example of Cromwell, he would propose to have hereditary succession—it is not perfectly clear—but I have shown that so recently as February last he declared that the ultimate effect of the federal scheme would be to abolish even the nominal authority of the Crown; and I presume that to-morrow, or next day, he will come here and give us his reasons for advocating the federal scheme in opposition to the scheme of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—

“The scheme, in fact, involves the absolute destruction of the historical Constitution of the United Kingdom, the creation of a tabula rasa, and the establishment thereupon of the United States Constitution in all its details. It may be that such a proposal would not be seriously objected to by consistent Radicals.”

We do not go so far—

“And it is probable that it would work without friction, and preserve a real union of the Empire—” observe, without the Crown—

“for defensive and offensive purposes; but it is hardly conceivable that the people of Great Britain, as a whole, are prepared for such a violent and complete revolution.”

Well, Sir, I do not think they are, and I do not think that the 40 individuals who, to-day, renewed their allegiance to the right hon. Gentleman in the Committee Room upstairs quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman's proposals mean nothing else than the supersession of the Crown. It is extremely difficult to follow the windings of the career of the right hon. Gentleman for the last few months. In the same article he declares his adhesion to the scheme attributed to Mr. Giffen for the settlement of the Land Question, his only objection being that the payment to the landlords would be too high, and might make too large a demand on the credit of the country. But far, from deprecating in February last the dealing on a gigantic scale with the Land Question, the right hon. Gentleman uses these words—

“Materials exist for a great transaction without risk or taxation which would place the Irish people in the possession of the land of their birth.”

The article goes on to point out that it involved a large payment to the landlords, and represented—

“A capital sum which affords a basis for an immense operation.”

Nothing less than an immense operation would satisfy the right hon. Gentleman in February last; but now he says he will not allow the British taxpayer to be pledged “in the way of land purchase.” So, in February last, if he, and not someone else, had the manipulation of the scheme, the right hon. Gentleman was, in the first place, prepared for a scheme of Republicanism which he foresaw would result in the overthrow of the Crown, and, in the next place, was ready to pledge the taxpayers of the country for an immense sum. But the right hon. Gentleman must deal with the Irish Question as a whole; and he goes on to say that the claims of the whole of the 600,000 cultivating tenants of Ireland would be entitled to serious consideration, and would not be lightly rejected. Now, we have been greatly puzzled to know what scheme the right hon. Gentleman has at present; but I think it would be still more interesting if, when he speaks on the question now before the House, he will give us a little more information as to his scheme of last February, and how it is that he so strongly objects to the Prime Minister's touching even a portion of it. But, Sir, if it is difficult to understand the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, it is impossible to understand that of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill). I do not intend to try to explain the gyrations of the noble Lord; but I have some information as to the course adopted by the noble Lord in reference to the last Election which may be of some slight interest to the House. Speaking at Birmingham he said, on the 23rd of October, during the last Election—

“It was contempt for Colonial opinion and Colonial aspiration, which more than 100 years ago cost us the loss of our American Colonies.”

But now the noble Lord is urging that the Irish opinion and the Irish aspirations should be treated with contempt.

In October and November last the opinions of the noble Lord, as far as we can judge, have shown themselves to be of a very different character. Why will he not express now the opinions which he did then? Speaking at St. Stephen's Club, on the 20th of May, 1885, the noble Lord is reported to have said—

"I believe most firmly that this ought to be the attitude of the Tory Party—that they ought to be anxious and careful beyond measure not to be committed to any act or policy which should unnecessarily wound and injure the feelings and the sentiments of our brothers on the other side of the Channel of St. George."

The Marquess of Salisbury, speaking in Her Majesty's Theatre the other night, thus alluded to "our brethren on the other side of the Channel of St. George;" he calls them aliens in race in religion and in sentiment. The House will be glad to know whether the noble Lord adheres to the opinion which he announced in Birmingham, or to the opinion of the noble Marquess. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the autumn of 1884 there was inaugurated in London, with a considerable amount of splutter, a Limited Liability Company, called by the name of the Conservative News Agency, Limited. The capital of that Company, whether it was paid up or not I cannot tell, was stated at £100,000, and the President of it was Lord Randolph Churchill. There were a good many distinguished Conservative members of the Association, the object of which was thus stated in the prospectus issued at the time, and published in The St. Stephen's Review—it was to "advance Constitutional principles, and especially to prepare voters for the coming General Election." That was published in July—the object of the Association being also to supply Provincial newspapers, scattered throughout the entire of the United Kingdom, with information of interest to the Conservative Party in articles stereotyped, or in proof. There were some 300 Conservative newspapers associated throughout the United Kingdom which were instructed in true Conservative principles by the noble Lord and his associates with a view to the working of the General Election on the Conservative platform. Well, Sir, this new Association, week after week, issued leading articles, London letters, political and social articles of various kinds, and in No. 7 appeared the first of a series of articles on Home Rule by Lady Florence Dixie. Those articles did not advocate a limited Parliament, but advocated the concession of Grattan's Parliament in its entirety; it advocated the restoration of what had existed before. I take an extract from the first of these articles, and their importance does not lie in their ability, which is the characteristic of everything written by Lady Florence Dixie, but in the fact that, with a view to the next General Election, they were circulated broadcast by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, for the purpose of educating the electors. The first article contained the following:—

"Ireland will, and shall, obtain Home Rule. The wild shriekers who formerly cried "never" are now racking their brains to discover how little the Irish will accept. . . . Home Rule is a Conservative measure. The Irish people ask but to re-establish what has been. They ask, through its instrumentality, to be made contented subjects of the Queen and loyal adherents of the Empire. Nothing to my mind is so revolting as to witness the opposition of Conservatives in Ireland to the National cause. It is a spectacle so unnatural as to cause disgust and resentment; yet I cannot believe that it will last. I am acquainted with many Conservative landlords and Loyalists in Ireland, and I know that the sentiments of many of them are in favour of Home Rule."

This article appeared in an enormous number of newspapers throughout the United Kingdom—it appeared in the noble Lord's special organ, The St. Stephen's Review, and was issued in a special sheet to the various newspapers with the compliments of the Association. It was supplied to me, in my capacity of proprietor and conductor of The Freeman's Journal, for publication in that journal. For that occasion only The Freeman's Journal was taken into favour, and was supplied with advanced proofs of the article for publication in Ireland, in order that the Irish people should be made aware of the attitude of the Conservative Leaders, especially the younger Leaders, towards the Irish people. In publishing these articles in The Freeman's Journal, I was very careful to point out that they were supplied by the Conservative News Association and by the noble Lord; and I marked it as a sign of the times, and a hopeful indication of the Conservative attitude, and used it as an argument why Irish voters in England should support the Conservatives at the Elections. How sadly is my confidence in the noble Lord shaken! But, surely, he will scarcely venture to contradict or repudiate his responsibility for the circulation of these articles. Early in September, 1885, I was supplied with another article from the same source, in which the author says—

“There is no half-way course, and the sooner British statesmen recognize the fact, so much the better.”

She goes on to define a strong policy of concession, and says—

“Of her own free will, Great Britain should hand back to Ireland the Parliament which she wrested from her in 1800.”

She proceeds to glorify Grattan's Parliament, and tell the history of its overthrow—

“It is for Great Britain seriously to ask herself whether it is practicable to restore to Ireland her undoubted right to have a Parliament of her own? I firmly believe it is the only policy which will establish friendly relations between Great Britain.”

Lady Florence Dixie goes on to point to the noble Lord himself, who we know is extremely modest, and does not allow compliments to interfere with business—

“Do I see arising amidst the Conservative ranks a young Leader who is facing the Irish problem, and recognizing the right of the Irish people to govern themselves? Shall it be from Conservative hands that Ireland will receive back her long-lost freedom? Something tells me that it will be so.”

In a further article, just before the Elections in October, the writer argues in support of the practicability of Home Rule. This was also issued in the same way as the others. The writer says—

“I think a Parliament at College Green is eminently practicable. A day will come when this will be acknowledged. Then why should everything be done too late? Is there no patriot British statesman who will arise and tell his countrymen the truth—who will wipe away this disgraceful stain of injustice, and give Ireland her just rights?”

On November 13, immediately prior to the Election, to keep the system up, and keep the Irish vote true to the Conservative cause, we have this article—

“Legislative independence far from its proving a source of separation and disintegration, as Mr Chamberlain and others would have us believe”— and now, I may say, we have the tables turned—we have the right hon. Member for West Birmingham going for federation, and the noble Lord the Member for Paddington going for I do not know what, but declining to go for Repeal of the Union—

“as Mr. Chamberlain and others would have us believe, and would insure the true union of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. In this course alone true unity is centred—any other must be productive of disunion and discontent.”

And this Conservative News Agency not only circulated articles from the National League, but from other sources. The St. Stephen's Review of December 19th, 1885, also published an article from Mr. Bellingham, late M.P. for Louth, advocating Home Rule. What are we to think of the position taken up by the young Leaders of the Conservative Party in view of the Election? They established a large organization, subscribed large sums of money, and associated themselves with newspapers in England, Scotland, and Wales by a system of supplying articles to those newspapers, in order to secure that they all should speak with one voice on the question of the day. And this is the class of literature they supplied in order to educate the voters up to the point of Home Rule, or, if not that, to deliberately deceive the Irish voters, and lead them to believe that the young Leaders of the Conservative Party would use their best endeavours to secure for Ireland not only the Repeal of the Union, but Grattan's Parliament, if the Irish vote were cast for the Conservatives. I am glad that I happened to preserve these extracts I have read; it was only through an accident that I did so, for I scarcely, at the time, thought them worth drawing attention to. [“Hear, hear!”] I can understand the right hon. Gentleman saying “Hear, hear!” I can well understand that he would have preferred that I should not draw attention to these extracts. Perhaps he will tell us what the exact position of the Conservative News Agency (Limited) is at this moment, and whether the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) still occupies the honoured and trusted position of President of the Association. I feel I have already occupied the House too long, and I will say but a very few words in conclusion. We are told by some that by passing this Bill we shall drive capital out of Ireland. I do not believe that we shall do anything of the kind. We are told that we shall destroy the industry of the North, and that capital will leave Belfast. Why, Sir, capital at this moment could not leave Belfast. Capital is locked up in Belfast, as everyone who is interested knows, and it is as impossible to realize it now as it has been at any time during the past seven or eight years. There is not a Bank in Ireland that has not large sums locked up in mills in Belfast, and not one-tenth of this capital could be realized in the event of great capitalists endeavouring to transfer their capital from Ireland to England, or other countries. Therefore, these statements as to driving capital from Ireland are all bunkum. It is impossible for capital to leave the North, for the reason that it must hold on to an industry which, I am sorry to say, is in a very depressed condition—and that not in consequence of any agitation which has taken place. The same state of things has existed eight or 10 years in consequence of the undue development of the linen industry during the American War. We are told that capital will leave other parts of Ireland. What capital? What English capital is there in Ireland? I am not aware of any, save one class. If we could procure a Return of the names of the shareholders in Irish Limited Liability Companies, Irish Railway Companies, Irish Insurance Offices, and other industrial enterprises of every kind, I venture to say that not 5 per cent of them would be found to be English. Not 5 per cent of the capital of Irish industrial enterprises is held by Englishmen. I was, some three years ago, greatly struck by a speech made by the Chairman of the London and North-Western Railway Company at a meeting of the shareholders of that Company—so struck by it that it has never left my memory. At that time there was a bitter contest going on in regard to the mail contract between Holyhead and Dublin. The Irish Members desired that the contract should be in the hands of an Irish Company; but the London and North-Western had obtained it, and were struggling to maintain it. Well, Mr. Moon, the gentleman to whom I refer, not the shareholders, and made a speech on the subject which I never forget. He stated that they had more Irish shareholders and a larger amount of Irish capital invested in the London and North-Western Railway Company—that English Company—than the whole capital of the City of Dublin Company, which was called an Irish Company. [An hon. MEMBER: Than there was English capital in the Irish Company.] Not at all. There would be nothing at all in the assertion that there was more Irish money in the London and North-Western Railway Company than there was English money in the Irish Company; but he said there was more Irish money invested in the London and North-Western Railway Company than the entire capital of the Irish Company. If we could arrive at the facts carefully by statistics, I have not the slightest doubt that there is at least three or four times the amount of Irish money invested in England than there is English money invested in Ireland, with, as I say, the exception of one single class of investments—namely, advances by way of mortgage on Irish land. We in Ireland can well afford, as far as industrial enterprises are concerned, to do without English aid. I am not aware that we ever had English aid to any substantial extent. During the period from 1848 to 1865, when Ireland was in a state of perfect tranquillity, when the Viceroy was congratulating the Queen, year after year, on the increase which was taking place in the flocks and herds, and when emigration was going on largely, withdrawing a large part of the poor population, I am not aware that there was any influx of English capital into Ireland. The only investments to any considerable extent of English capital in Ireland are loans upon Irish land; and I think those loans, far from benefiting any section of the community, have proved a curse to the country. They tempted Irish landlords into extravagance; they tempted them to come over here, and vie with men far richer than themselves in display and ostentation. They caused them to get plunged into debt, and the result was that they were induced to put pressure on their tenants, and to raise their rents. This has brought something like ruin upon the Irish landlords and tenants. Why was it that we had this influx of English money in the shape of mortgages on Irish land? Was it from a philanthropic impulse? Nothing of the kind. It was simply because any money lender, any Insurance Company, any capitalist with a large sum to dispose of, and not knowing what to do with it, could procure from  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 per cent on a first-class mortgage on Irish land; whereas only from 3 to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was to be obtained on similar security in England. One and a-half or two per cent more was to be got out of Irish than out of English mortgages. Money was lent on mortgages on Irish land for the same reason that it is lent on mortgage on American land. There was nothing of philanthropy in it, and no desire to promote the interests of Ireland. The only reason was that those who invested got a higher usury; and if these investors suffer now from the condition of things that they themselves have helped to bring about, I do not think there is any section of the House which should feel any particular commiseration for them. The loans they made to the Irish landlords, so far as we are concerned, have been a curse to the country; and this is the only kind of investment of English capital in Ireland that has taken place to any extent that I have the slightest knowledge of. And now I should like just for a moment to consider the commercial effect of the defeat, or even serious postponement, of this Bill. I say its effect will be extremely disastrous. We are told that in consequence of the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and his Friends this Bill is going to be defeated. For my own part, I do not believe these flimsy forecasts; but if the Bill be defeated, I fear that the result upon Ireland will be extremely disastrous. It is a marvellous thing for me to find some Members below the Gangway opposite telling us that they are going to vote against the Bill, not because they share the opinions of Gentlemen above the Gangway, which opinions we can understand and respect, not because of any opposition to the Bill on the principle propounded by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), but because they do not think the Bill good enough for us. They desire, they say, to frame a complete measure. I often wonder whether this is a real excuse—whether they really are serious. I think it is, on the part of some of the Leaders of the Party, merely a transparent excuse; that it is an excuse to cover an inveterate hostility, not only to the Bill,

but to the author of it, and to conceal a feeling of pique, and jealousy, and spleen unworthy of any man, or of any men pretending to be statesmen, dealing with a great question of this kind, affecting the lives, liberties, and happiness of millions of Her Majesty's subjects. I do believe that there are some hon. Members below the Gangway who are really thinking of voting against this Bill because they think it would be injurious to Ireland. I would ask them to consider for a moment what they think would be the effect of the rejection of the measure. I was speaking within the last three or four days to a gentleman practically at the head of one of the greatest—I think we may call it the greatest—commercial institution in Ireland. He looked forward, as all who are aware of the condition of affairs in Ireland do, with something like consternation to the rejection of the Bill. He looked forward with the utmost possible hope and gratification at the prospect of its being speedily passed. The institution he is connected with is probably more intimately bound up with the commercial prosperity of Ireland than any other in the Three Kingdoms, and its managers are probably better able to judge of the commercial effects of a measure of this kind than anyone in Ireland. Well, such was the opinion of this gentleman; but, at the same time, he said he would rather see the Bill rejected than see it mutilated, and he suggested to me to urge on every person who might have influence to urge on the Government, above all things, to maintain the provisions, and rather take all risks than mutilate the measure. Crossing over from Boulogne a week ago, I met an English gentleman at the head of one of the greatest firms in the United Kingdom, which has agencies and branch offices in every great town of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. He expressed himself strongly in favour of this measure. I asked him what, in his opinion, would be the effect upon the great business which he carries on in every great town in Ireland? I asked him whether, as an Englishman, he was apprehensive that it would injure his trade in any way, and he said it would have no effect. But what he said was seriously affecting his business, and would probably affect it still more seriously, was the condition of suspense and uncertainty into which they were plunged, which checked all kinds of commercial enterprize. That is the position in which some people propose to plunge Ireland for the next 12 months. The Times the other day threatened that the English merchants in Mincing Lane were about to stop our credit, and that if this Bill passed they would supply us with no more tea and sugar, and so on. We could with equanimity bear to be deprived of supplies from Mincing Lane. We could ourselves make up for the deficiency. It is said, however, that that would have the result of dragging down two or three Irish banks. Well, I do not think the action of any merchants in England, or of the whole combined commercial community in England, would affect the stability of a single Irish bank; but the paralysis of trade throughout Ireland and the complete suspension of all but an absolutely necessary amount of business which would follow the rejection of this Bill, and the state of uncertainty in which we should be plunged, would have the most deleterious effect upon business. With some knowledge of the facts, I say that Ireland is not in a position to stand the terrible strain to which she will be subjected in the next six months or 12 months if the Bill be rejected. If hon. Gentlemen opposite go with a light heart into the Division Lobby against the measure, not because of their apprehensions as to the result of the Bill on the United Kingdom, but because, forsooth, they consider themselves better framers of Constitutions, and better able to judge of what the ultimate results of the Bill will be, than the Prime Minister, who has been 30 years in this House, and whose experience is unrivalled, I venture to warn them that possibly they may not be able to regard the results of their handiwork with much satisfaction. I have no apprehension that any outbreak of outrage of a serious character in Ireland will follow the rejection of the Bill. I do not believe anything of the kind. I believe the Irish people are sufficiently politically educated and sufficiently strong to keep their souls in peace; and I await with perfect confidence the result of the struggle, no matter how long it may be protracted. But if the suspension of our Irish legislation results in the landlords resorting to eviction, then I warn the House that no coercive legislation, that no power which you possess, that no power that we possess, will be sufficient for the prevention of outrage. It is no use talking to desperate men, thrown out on the roadside, helpless and homeless, of the good intentions of English Members—it is no use telling them they may have this measure 12 years hence, when there is nothing before them but the workhouse. What they want is some immediate relief; and if you refuse this Bill or delay it, and Irish landlords avail themselves as far as they can of the interregnum for purposes of eviction, then I certainly regard the future outlook in Ireland with something approaching to consternation. I do not believe that great as is the influence of hon. Gentlemen around me with the people of Ireland, and loyally as I believe that influence will, under any circumstances, be exerted to check outrage—I do not believe it will be in their power to check it any more than it will be in your power to check it, no matter what course of coercion you adopt. I do appeal to hon. Gentlemen to consider seriously the nature of the step that they are about to take in voting against this measure. The spirit of the Irish people is now such as certainly in my experience, which extends over 15 years, I never saw equalled. This Bill does not meet the entire demands put forward by the Irish nation. It is essentially in the nature of a compromise; but the Irish people are now willing loyally to accept that compromise. I am satisfied they will one and all be ready to stand by it, and carry it out in the spirit and the letter. What they will be prepared to do 12 months hence neither you, Sir, nor I, know. In the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, you may have to inscribe on your annals 12 months hence, when he comes to bring forward his federation scheme, the words you have had to inscribe so often on the records of English rule in Ireland—"Too late."

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(J. Chamberlain,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned tomorrow.

MEDICAL ACTS AMENDMENT

BILL.—[BILL 163.]

(Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Mundella, The Lord Advocates.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 17th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title and construction) agreed to.

PART I.

ADMISSION TO MEDICAL PRACTICE AND CONSTITUTION OF GENERAL COUNCIL.

Qualifying Examinations.

Clause 2 (Examination before registration) agreed to.

Clause 3 (Qualifying examinations held by medical authorities).

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, S.): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, lines 19 and 20, to leave out "for the time being capable of granting any such diploma or diplomas," and insert "or any medical corporation legally qualified at the passing of this Act, to grant such diploma or diplomas in respect of medicine and surgery."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Sir HENRY HOLLAND (Hampstead): This, practically, is only an enlargement of the Amendment I have put on the Paper.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 23, after "examination," insert "in medicine, surgery, and midwifery, and of whom one at least is capable of granting such diploma as aforesaid in respect of medicine, and one at least is capable of granting such diploma in respect of surgery."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Dr. O'DOHERTY (Meath, N.): I have put upon the Paper several Amendments to this clause; but I was not aware the Bill would be brought on to-night, and therefore I am not quite prepared to proceed with them. The Bill has been brought on unexpectedly, and therefore I ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Lyon Playfair) to postpone the consideration of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, leave out "at," and insert "for."—(Dr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'at' stand part of the Clause."

Sir LYON PLAYFAIR: This, the first Amendment, bears upon all the Amendments the hon. Gentleman suggests. It would be quite impossible to accept these Amendments, because they affect the principle of the Bill. This Bill differs from any of the 22 Bills which have been introduced with the object of reforming the Medical Laws. The qualifying examination will be, I hope, the maximum, and not the minimum; and the Amendments of the hon. Gentleman (Dr. O'Doherty) indicate the minimum standard of education in each part of the Kingdom. I am sorry I cannot agree to them.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 10, leave out "with the sanction of the Privy Council."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Withdrawal from medical authorities of right to hold qualifying examinations).

Sir HENRY HOLLAND (Hampstead): The object of this Amendment—

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, S.): My right hon. Friend (Sir Henry Holland) proposes to amend the clause by a provision that the Privy Council shall not, "of their own motion," have power to revoke an Order. I am obliged to take the wind out of his sails, because I have Amendments, not on the Paper, which relate to a previous part of the clause. I propose to leave out the words in lines 39, 40, and 41—

"The Privy Council, upon the representation of the General Council, or of their own motion," and to insert in their place—

"Her Majesty, with the advice of Her Privy Council, if upon further representation of the General Council or otherwise, it seems to Her expedient so to do."

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 39, 40, and 41, leave out "the Privy Council, upon the representation of the General Council, or of their own motion," and insert "Her Majesty, with the advice of Her Privy Council, if upon further representation of the General Council or otherwise, it seems to Her expedient so to do."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: My objection is to the Privy Council having the power of themselves at any time to revoke an Order. The whole point of the section is the power given to the General Council. Why the Privy Council, upon their own motion, shall have power to revoke an Order is a point I do not understand, and it is very much objected to. I therefore intended to move to leave out the words "of their own motion." The Privy Council should certainly have the power to take this action upon the representation of the General Council, but not without it.

MR. DILLON Mayo, E.): The Amendment does not appear on the Paper; perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain why he proposes it.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I am afraid the words I propose are not fairly understood. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry Holland) will find them in the 1st clause of the Act of 1858. The General Council is to move on its own representation. The words are—

"Her Majesty, with the advice of Her Privy Council, if upon further representation of the General Council or otherwise, it seems to Her expedient so to do."

First of all, the General Council is to make representation, and it is not upon Her mere motion that Her Majesty revokes the Order, but she does so in Council.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain the words "or otherwise." If he would leave out these words I should be quite prepared to accept the Amendment.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I cannot do that, because then there would be no appeal. It is right that the Corporation or University from which representation is taken away should have the power of appeal.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to substitute for "or otherwise" the words "or upon appeal?"

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I will endeavour to meet the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman on Report.

Question put, and negatived.

Question,

"That the words, 'Her Majesty, with the advice of Her Privy Council, if upon further representation of the General Council or otherwise, it seems to Her expedient so to do,' be there inserted,"

—put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Qualifying examinations held by medical corporation with assistant examiners).

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 15, after "examinations," insert "and the General Council are satisfied that the said medical corporation has used its best endeavours to enter into such combination as aforesaid, and is unable to do so on reasonable terms."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. O'DOHERTY (Meath, N.): Before passing this clause—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): Order, order! The hon. Member proposes to move a new clause in substitution for Clause 5.

DR. O'DOHERTY: After Clause 4.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is a new clause, which must be taken at the end. If the hon. Gentleman objects to this clause, he must object to it when I put it to the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, lines 16 and 17, leave out "and subject to the sanction and control of the Privy Council."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, lines 29 and 30, leave out "subject to the sanction and control of the Privy Council."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, lines 36 and 37, leave out "with the sanction of the Privy Council."—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

DR. O'DOHERTY: I propose that this clause be omitted, and a new clause inserted in its place.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman will give his reasons why the clause should be omitted. The question of the substitution of a new clause will arise at the end.

DR. O'DOHERTY: The reason why I propose to leave out this clause is that, in my opinion, it does not meet the requirement it is intended to meet; that it will not prevent one or other of these Colleges refusing to join and take part in these examinations. On that account it will prevent the object of the Bill being effected. By the clause I suggest, however, the object of the measure will be much more effectually secured.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I also object to the clause, because, under it, it is quite possible for a powerful Corporation to very much oppress a weaker one. It is quite open to the College of Physicians in Dublin to refuse, if it chooses, to enter into an arrangement with the Apothecaries Hall. It would be utterly and entirely destructive of the object the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Lyon Playfair) has in view in bringing forward this Bill—namely, the development of medical science, if there were refusals to take part in the examinations. The clause, as it stands, will, I am persuaded, open the door to a great number of abuses.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I am sure the hon. Members from Ireland themselves will be very much disappointed if this clause is rejected. Of course, we know that in Ireland there is a Body called the Apothecaries Company. That Body may, or may not, be taken in combination with other objects; but this clause gives power to the General Council to act in such a case. I think it would be better if the hon. Gentleman (Dr. O'Doherty) allowed the clause to pass, and moved on Report, or at the end of the Committee, some words which would strengthen the compulsory powers, but which words, I must tell him, I would resist. I think he himself would be exceedingly disappointed if this clause were to be omitted.

DR. KENNY: I do not think that the clause in any way carries out the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. It appears to me that the appointment of the Examiners will be destructive to the Local Bodies, which will have to fall back even to a lower level than they stand at the present time. The object of the right hon. Gentleman is to elevate these Local Bodies; but I am positive that the clause appointing the Examiners will have the opposite effect. If my hon. Friend moves his Amendment on Report the right hon. Gentleman will oppose it; and that I feel certain is sufficient reason for us to press on the proposal to eliminate this clause at the present stage of the Bill. Considering the lateness of the hour and the importance of the clause, I beg to move, Sir, that you now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Kenny.)

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I hope the hon. Member will not press his Motion to report Progress. There is really no opposition to the Bill. All the Corporations and Universities in the Kingdom approve of the Bill, and wish to see it pass; and, considering the present critical times, what chance is there of the Bill being carried to a successful conclusion if unnecessary delays now take place? Since 1870 there have been no fewer than 22 Bills on this subject, all of which have been strongly opposed. The present measure is not opposed to any extent. All the Medical Corporations and all the Universities have written to me suggesting alterations, many of which I have been pleased to adopt. I hope the Motion to report Progress will not be persisted in.

DR. FOSTER (Chester): I hope the hon. Member for South Cork will not press this Motion. Although we members of the Medical Profession regard the Bill as a small one, still it contains some principles which are dear to us; and we look upon it as an important measure, which will confer good upon the public at large, and we hope to see it become law. I trust that the hon. Member will withdraw his Motion.

DR. KENNY: The right hon. Gentleman says that no opposition has come to this Bill from any of the Medical Corporations; that is quite true. I believe these Bodies generally look on the measure as a preservation of their rights and privileges; but I entertain very serious objection to the Bill, because I think that it does not treat the Profession at large with any fairness at all. The provision for giving representation on the Medical Council is utterly inadequate. I am not here to speak on behalf of any Corporation, but for the Profession at large, and for the public, who have still a larger interest in any questions affecting the Medical Profession, and the provisions for whose protection are entirely illusory. I am afraid that I cannot yield to the hon. Member (Dr. Foster), who has just suggested that I should withdraw my Motion for reporting Progress. If I receive any assurance from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Lyon Playfair) that later on a better representation of the Profession at large will be provided for in the Bill I will withdraw the Motion; but from what I have heard, and from what has already taken place, I fear there is no prospect of any such assurance being given.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I would appeal to my hon. Friend Dr. Kenny to withdraw his Motion. As far as I can understand it, although the Bill does not go far enough, it seems to meet the crying grievances which have existed in the Profession for years. I would point out to my hon. Friend that he will have an opportunity of raising the point at issue at a later stage of the Bill, and that an Amendment is on the Paper dealing with the point in which he is interested. I would earnestly urge him to withdraw his Motion, and bring his recommendations up at a later period.

Dr. KENNY: Under the circumstances, Sir, I beg to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 6 Privileges of registered persons agreed to

Constitution of General Council.

Clause 7 Members of General Council).

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR): I beg to move, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 17, to leave out "six" and insert "five."

Question, "That the word 'six' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the word 'five' be there inserted."

Dr. FOSTER (Chester): I beg to move, as an Amendment, that the word "four" be there inserted. I would point out that these six nominees of the Crown were originally placed on the Council in default of any representation being given to the Medical Profession; the argument used when the old Act was passed was that representation could not be given, as there was no register upon which representatives could be elected. We now think, however, that the time has come when the Profession can obtain substantial representation, and that we ought to have, at least, a majority of the minority of the Council. Under this Bill the majority will still be in the hands of the Corporations; but there will be 10 members independent of these Universities and Corporations, and I do not think it is unreasonable that the Profession should ask to have a representation of six members, and the Crown four. As I pointed out to the House on the second reading of this Bill, the vast majority of the Medical Profession reside in England; and, as I stated then, that constituency will be greatly unrepresented by only having two members on the Council. In order to increase this representation I propose to give four members instead of six to the Crown; and I think the House will see that the time has come when steps should be taken to prevent the continuance of the great disparity between the representatives of the Profession and the nominees of the Crown.

Amendment proposed, "That the word 'four' be there inserted."—(Dr. Foster.)

Sir LYON PLAYFAIR: Everyone will admit that the Crown nominees have always been the most distinguished men of the Profession. They have represented the Medical Profession even more than the Corporations, and have adorned the Council to which they have been sent. I think that everyone will admit that. Although I am unwilling, therefore, to decrease the number of Crown nominees, still I was so struck by the observations of my hon. Friend (Dr. Foster) on the second reading, that I consented to sacrifice one of the Crown nominees, in order to give an additional representative to England, making five in all of the Profession, and I think my hon. Friend will consider that I have met him as far as possible. In this way no increase will be put upon the expenses of the Council, whose funds are only small, and who cannot afford to bear great expense. Under these circumstances I must adhere to the word "five."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I must say this. It is an exceptional thing for me to support Crown nominees; but I do think that under this Bill it is not well to give so large a representation to Corporations as compared with Crown nominees. I am inclined to agree with the right hon. Gentleman that these Crown nominees are amongst the most distinguished men in the Profession, and represent more fully the Medical Profession than the nominees of the Corporations; and, therefore, I shall support him.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I also am inclined to think that the Crown nominees are among the most distinguished men in the Profession; and I am much more disposed, later on, to move an increase of the representation of the Profession at large, than to move to decrease the number of the Crown nominees. No doubt, if we cannot give a better representation to the Profession at large later on, I should agree with the last Amendment, because the increase must come from somewhere; but I think it can be better met in another way. It seems to me that the proper course to pursue is, whilst we are grouping Medical Bodies in the country for the purposes of examinations, to do it also for purposes of representation. By that means we can leave the nominees of the Crown as they are, and give the Profession a much larger representation.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I hope the Committee will accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chester (Dr. Foster). I think it will be preferable that we should have on the Council only four members nominated by the Privy Council. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Lyon Playfair), in the argument he brought forward in favour of having five Crown nominees, entirely ignored what all Members of the House will expect — namely, that although these Crown nominees may be among the most distinguished men in the Profession, it will be an extraordinary thing if, when the medical practitioners of the three countries have the opportunity of selecting gentlemen to represent them, they do not themselves select the most distinguished men in the Profession.

Amendment (Dr. Foster), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Sir Lyon Playfair) put, and agreed to.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): The object which I have in moving this Amendment—namely, in page 4, after line 27, insert, as new lines, "the Victoria University; the University of Durham" will be plain to the Committee. At the present moment the University of Durham has a representative on the Council; but the new University—the Victoria—has none, and under the Bill the two are to be amalgamated, and are only to have one representative between them. The Victoria University is a young and increasing University, whereas Durham is an old one. In fact, the two are of an entirely different character. The Victoria University has a well-equipped and numerous-attended Medical School, where the scientific education is of the highest kind. It includes the Owen's College, Manchester, and the University College, Liverpool, both containing flourishing Medical Schools, and it is hoped that in a short time the Leeds Medical School connected with the Yorkshire College will also become affiliated. We have, at the present moment, upwards of 500 students, who will form the bulk of the practising physicians and surgeons of the North of England; and I therefore think we deserve to have a representative of our own on the Council. Durham University is entirely removed from the centre of the Victoria University, and the appliances which it possesses for scientific education are decidedly inferior to those proposed by the younger University, which are of the most complete and most modern description; and, therefore, I have to move that Durham University and the Victoria University have each a representative on the Council.

Amendment proposed.

In page 4, line 27, to leave out from the word "London," to the word "collectively," in line 29, in order to insert the words—"The Victoria University; The University of Durham."—(Sir Henry Roscoe.)

LORD FREDERICK HAMILTON (Manchester, S.W.): I merely wish to corroborate what has fallen from the hon. Member for South Manchester (Sir Henry Roscoe), that the Victoria University is entitled by its importance to nominate a member of the Medical Council. It is entitled to that privilege by its importance, not merely because of the work done by it, but also from the fact that it is now the educational centre of the whole of the county of Lancashire and of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The system of education there is totally different to that given at the Durham University, and the classes from which the students are drawn are different. In fact, there is nothing in common between them, except that the students are drawn from the North of England; but even the geographical argument is not a strong one, for Durham is no nearer Manchester than Oxford. No one can contend that the addition of one member to the Medical Council can be a matter of material importance; and, looking at the growing importance of the Victoria University, I think the Amendment should be assented to.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I hope the Committee will allow me to say a word in support of this Amendment. I am quite certain that those who know what is going on in connection with the Educational Institutions of Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds will bear me out when I say that the University which is the centre of those Institutions is fully entitled to representation on the Medical Council. The Manchester Medical School has long been celebrated for its skill and knowledge, as also have those of Liverpool and Leeds; and I feel sure the Committee will consider they are entitled to representation. I think, also, that the University will grow rapidly year by year and become more powerful, and before long the number who belong to it will be very largely increased. Durham is not a sister University to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and I feel that any association between the Victoria University and the University of Durham would be valueless, inasmuch as the cause of those Universities would not be advanced by such union. I do not see how the two Universities could choose a member of the Council collectively. There seems to be a great technical difficulty which renders such collective action impracticable.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I do not think I overrate the importance of these large Medical Schools of Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds when I say I think they are justly entitled to representation on the Medical Council.

DR. FOSTER (Chester): With regard to the Amendment before the Committee, I would point out that the representation on the Medical Council is already considered too great by the Profession, by whose taxation that representation is entirely kept up, and yet we have an Amendment before us to increase that representation by adding a member for the Victoria University. The Victoria University is young, but it is a growing University, and when it has further developed it will, in my opinion, be quite time to give it a member in the Council. I am afraid, however, the Durham University is not growing; but, with regard to the Victoria University, I have no doubt that, at the proper time, it will have a member of its own.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen-shire, W.): I think my hon. Friend (Sir Henry Roscoe) has made out a good case for the Victoria University having its own representative on the Medical Council. It is a young school, and it is doing good work. I propose to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend on selfish grounds, as I may have a similar proposal to make on behalf of the University of Aberdeen.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton): I can bear my testimony to the fact that the Medical School of the Victoria University is doing very good work, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will agree to the Amendment.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I am bound, with regret, to oppose this Amendment, and if my hon. Friend goes to a division I shall be unable to vote with him. The Victoria University is a very promising one; but it is, nevertheless, in its infancy, and, although many are taught there, it has very few graduates. I beg to point out that the General Council, under Clause 10, has power to give separate representation to any University which supports its claim to such representation; and, therefore, I should not feel justified in voting for the Amendment of my hon. Friend, although, in view of the general feeling exhibited in favour of the proposal, I shall not join in opposition to it.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): I am exceedingly glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman has gone so far to meet the general opinion of the Committee. As far as the Medical Profession of Leeds are concerned, they speak with a united voice on this subject, and entirely in accordance with the view of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry Roscoe).

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I confess that my vote on this Amendment would be a good deal influenced by the number of the constituency, as to which at present I have no knowledge. Perhaps some hon. Member authorized to speak on behalf of the Victoria University will give us information on that point. I should like to know, if we are to give representation to the Victoria University and the University of Durham, what would be the constituency in both cases?

DR. FOSTER (Chester): I do not think there are more than 100 graduates of the Victoria University at the present time, and it would be hardly fair to give that small number the same representation as London University.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE: I would point out that the Governing Body of the Victoria University is a thoroughly representative one, and that the University Court would, in all probability, be the Elective Body by whom the representative would be chosen.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I think objection to this Amendment comes with a worse grace from the hon. Baronet the Member for London University (Sir John Lubbock) than from any Member of the House. He ought to recollect that there was a proposal included in the Reform Bill of Mr. Disraeli to unite Durham University with the University of London. ["No, no!"] The hon. Baronet contradicts me; but I followed the discussion in the House of Commons at the time closer, perhaps, than he did, and my recollection is perfectly clear upon the subject, and I remember that it was pointed out that to attach a young and growing University like that of London to a dying University like that of Durham was an act similar to that of tying together a living person and a corpse. If that argument was good then it is good now, against joining Durham to other Medical Bodies. I repeat that the argument against the Amendment comes with a very bad grace from the hon. Baronet.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) quite misunderstands what I said. I remarked that when it was proposed to give one Member to Victoria University and one to Durham, it was natural to ask to be informed how large were the constituencies they would represent. I have not made up my mind how I shall vote on this question, and it will greatly depend upon the information I may receive.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I understand the hon. Baronet to say that he wishes to know, as I also should like to know, how many graduates there are at the two Universities in question? It is known that the number of undergraduates at Durham is very limited; and though the Victoria University is a growing institution, it is only growing in the sense in which a baby is said to grow, and I think the time has hardly arrived for giving it representation. In fact, I heard the other day that there are only 20 or 30 graduates.

MR. GIBSON (Liverpool, Walton): The principle on which I think the Committee ought to act in this matter is that the interests of medical education in the North of England all converge towards the Victoria University. The medical men of Yorkshire and Lancashire are, I think, entitled to have a centre of their own, and that medical centre is the Victoria University, which is a growing Institution. She ought to have more representation than Durham; but, according to this Bill, a hybrid system of representation is sought to be established, and it is exceedingly difficult to understand what proportion of it each should take. I think it would be right for us to say that Victoria University should be represented. But we must not look alone at the interest of Universities; we must look to the interest of the Medical Profession in the North of England generally.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I must give this proposal my strongest opposition, because it embodies a principle which, in my opinion, is false to everything which this Bill is intended to effect. If we look into the proposal we shall see that the Committee is asked to extend to these two Universities increased representation; and it is very plain that, up to the present time, the Licensing Bodies have had too great power in their hands. If I understand the general tenour of the Bill, it is to take power in a great degree out of the hands of those Bodies and place it in those of a well-selected General Council. If we commence, at this early period of the discussion, to put on the Medical Council representatives of new Universities, what is there to prevent other hon. Gentlemen from standing up for their own Universities and small Medical Schools in other portions of the Kingdom? I say that the Amendment is false to the principle of the Bill, and certainly hope that it will be withdrawn.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE (Surrey, Reigate): The objection which I have to the proposal is that it proposes to add to the Medical Council, which is too large already. There is a great disadvantage in having so many people to talk, and in the Medical Council already debates and discussions are carried on, the extreme length of which is a great impediment to business. It would be quite as reasonable for one of the great hospitals—St. Bartholomew's, for instance—to ask to have representation on the Council, as it would be for the Victoria University. I object to this proposal; in the first place, because it would increase the number of members of the Medical Council; and, in the next, because I think there are other Universities which have stronger claims.

Question put, and negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 119, Noes 42: Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to move, as an Amendment in page 4, to leave out lines 28 and 29.

Question, "That lines 28 and 29, in page 4, stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): After the division which has just taken place I rise with a light and cheerful heart to propose the Amendment which stands in my name; and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will exhibit, for the old University of Aberdeen, a little of that affection which he has exhibited towards the young Victoria University. There is a very strong feeling in favour of this Amendment, which is as follows:—In page 4, after line 36, insert "The University of Aberdeen; the University of St. Andrew's." Although the actual population in the North of Scotland may be small, there is no doubt that all over the world you find Scottish graduates, and, as a general rule, you find them doing excellent work. We have heard just now that the Victoria University represents the medical education of the North of England. Well, Sir, the Aberdeen University represents the medical education of the North of Scotland. It has been growing rapidly during the last few years. During the last 22 years it has nearly doubled; it now represents over 400 students, and is increasing every year. We know that the students make their mark in the world, and I think that the claim of the University of Aberdeen to separate representation is fully equal of that of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, and even to that of the University of London. I have not said a word about the University of St. Andrew's. It is very small, but it is growing, and it is very likely to be affiliated with Dundee, and thus to represent in the future an important educational centre. I beg to propose the words of which I have given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 36, to leave out from the word "Glasgow," to the word "collectively," in line 38, in order to insert the words—"The University of Aberdeen; the University of St. Andrew's."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

DR. FOSTER (Chester): I shall oppose this on the same principle as I opposed the last extension of the representation of these Corporations. One of the defects of the Medical Council ever since 1859 has been that these Corporations have had all the representation, and the Medical Profession have had none. It is very hard that the Profession should have to pay all the money to support the Council, and have practically no representation. I asked that we should get a representative out of the Crown nominees, but I did not succeed—although the Committee has consented to give a representative to the Victoria University. On behalf of the Medical Profession I protest against any further representation being given to these Corporations, and on the Report stage I shall endeavour to alter the system, believing it to be wrong.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, N.): I voted in the "No" Lobby in the last division; but I believe that in proportion to the other representations, Scotland is not sufficiently well represented, and in the present state of feeling in the Committee it appears to me that it would be useless to oppose the Amendment. Certainly, the University of Aberdeen has a much better claim to representation than the Victoria University. It passes 73 Doctors and Bachelors of Medicine annually, and it has a very large constituency. The Committee will see how important it is, when I say that the Cambridge University, which has now an important Medical School, and to which no one would dream of refusing representation, only passes 27 medical men a year, while Aberdeen passes 73. Therefore, having given representation to the Victoria University I do not see how we can refuse it to Aberdeen.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Before we go to a division I should like to know whether these Amendments mean a corresponding increase in the representation of the Profession? At present we are only to have two from Ireland, two from Scotland, and four from England; and before going to a division I should like to know if that number is to be increased? The promoters of the Bill do not seem to recognize the fact that it is the great majority of the Medical Corporations which are in the habit of obstructing medical measures in Parliament, and if I had thought for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman was going to refuse an increase in the representation of the members of the Profession I doubt very much if I should have voted as I did on the last Amendment.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I do not think it can be said that the Scottish Universities have stood in the way of medical reforms. I will not trouble the House with facts and figures in regard to the University of Aberdeen, which I have the honour to represent in this House; but I may say, as the right hon. Gentleman has shown, it is a large and flourishing Medical School. What I would lay before the House is the inconvenience of associating the Universities of Aberdeen and St. Andrew's for collective representation on the Medical Council, inasmuch as the two Universities are not similar in regard to the matter of medical faculties. The University of Aberdeen has a Medical School, while St. Andrew's is an Examining Body in regard to medical studies. It has a large number of medical graduates, and fulfils special functions in regard to medical education. I do not suggest that those functions should be taken away; but I do think it is inconvenient, under these circumstances, to associate Aberdeen and St. Andrew's in regard to representation on this Council. Therefore, I hope the Committee will not hesitate to grant separate representation on the Medical Council to each of these Universities.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I voted in favour of the separate representation of the Victoria University, because I was unwilling that the Victoria University should have no representation at all. I do not, however, think the present Motion should be adopted, for I trust the members of the Medical Council will not be increased, because I am sure those acquainted with the working of it will agree that the numbers are sufficiently large. If my hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) goes to a division, I am afraid I shall not be able to vote with him.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities : As the Representative of the University of St. Andrew's, I may be allowed to say a word, particularly after what has fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London—Sir John Lubbock : I do not think that the majority of the Committee will accept it from him that they made a mistake in their last division, and that therefore they must do a gross injustice in this case. It is plain upon the face of it that, if a member is to be given to each of the Universities in England, there is no reason why a member should not be given to each of the Universities in Scotland. St. Andrew's is the most ancient University in Scotland, and is quite as much entitled to separate representation as the Victoria University or the University of Durham. St. Andrew's has great prospects before it. Within a very short time it will be within half-an-hour's journey of Dundee, in which there is a flourishing University College established [Laighlee]. Hon. Members seem to be under some delusion about that. There is a University College established there, with a most excellent endowment, and in a short time there will be developed a very considerable number of medical schools there. The number of medical undergraduates in St. Andrew's is at present large, and therefore the University is fairly entitled to separate representation.

DR. FOSTER : It is all very well for the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) to say that St. Andrew's has a large number of medical undergraduates. He must know that St. Andrew's is the University of the United Kingdom which has brought disgrace upon the Medical Profession. Boatloads of English students go up there simply to take the degrees. At the present time it has no actual working medical school, and it only makes 10 aged practitioners doctors of medicine annually. It is said there is no argument against this proposition. The argument against the Amendment is this—Scotland has six representatives, it will have one Crown and one direct representative—that is, it will have eight members on the General Medical Council, while the United Kingdom population of the country is under 800,000. England, with a medical population of 16,000, will only have seven representatives. I shall take a division on the question.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD : How many of the medical men in England came from the Scotch Universities?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.) : The more I hear in the course of this debate, the more firmly convinced I am that there are too many corners being fought. This Bill is not intended to benefit the Medical Profession or any of the Bodies specified; but it is intended to benefit society at large, and, therefore, the fewer of the Corporations and Institutions that you grant power to, the better will be the provision you will make for the security of the general public. I feel great diffidence in addressing the Committee; but, having had some little experience, I feel bound to express the opinion, an opinion which I know perfectly well all my medical friends share, that the more you cut down these Corporations the greater benefit you will confer on the public. We have admitted the Victoria University to separate representation, and now it is proposed to grant separate representation to the University of Aberdeen and the University of St. Andrew's. Goodness knows where we shall stop. If the Universities of Aberdeen and St. Andrew's are admitted to representation, I shall certainly, on behalf of the Irish Bodies, ask for representation for the Catholic University and for the Magee College in Belfast.

MR. LACAITA (Dundee) : This is not a question of the comparative representation of Scotland as compared with England, but a question of what is due to the University of Aberdeen. I do not think many hon. Members will admit they made a mistake in the last division; but if there were hon. Members who went into the Lobby with the hon. Member for South Manchester (Sir Henry Roscoe) by mistake, they must have been very few in number. What claim has Durham University to separate representation that is not possessed by Aberdeen and St. Andrew's?

MR. JOHNS (Warwick, Nuneaton) : I have no desire to take part in the discussion, but simply rise to say that if the Medical Gentlemen in the House will not get on a little quicker with the Business, I must ask you, Mr. Courtney, to report Progress.

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): I do not propose to go on with this matter now; but the Bill has been so amended in Committee that it will be better to make some slight alteration in the Bill, so as it shall read "to make better provision for appeals from judgments of County Courts;" then leave out the word "under," and insert "and amend," so that it will run "and amend the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers Act, 1875."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LOCKWOOD (York): On behalf of those who are interested in this Bill, I have to say that we have great pleasure in accepting this Amendment.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I should like to know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman does not think that the same effect would be obtained by a direction from the Bench?

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: The Amendment has been put down on the suggestion of a Judge who, perhaps, has as great experience of Criminal Law as any other man on the Bench. As my hon. Friend will see, it is not compulsory on the Judge, but he will simply have the discretionary power.

GRAVESEND AND NORTHFLEET DOCKS AND RAILWAYS BILL.

MOTION.

EARL CADOGAN, in rising to move—

"That the Examiners' Certificate of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee," said, that the Bill was before their Lordships' House last year, and when it came before the Standing Orders Committee it was found that the promoters had not complied in one particular provided for in the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House—namely, that the money should be deposited before January 15. The money in this case was not deposited until some weeks later, and the Standing Orders Committee of their Lordships' House last year unanimously refused to suspend that Standing Order, and the Bill was thrown out. The noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition proposed a Motion to the effect that the Examiners' Certificate should be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee. After discussion, that Motion was negatived without a division. With regard to the Bill this year, he was bound to admit that the promoters had again failed in the same respect as last year. There were those who asserted that the Standing Orders should always be maintained. He yielded to no one in his respect for the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House, and in his desire to see them strictly adhered to; but when he was asked what was the use of Standing Orders if they were not adhered to? he would reply by asking another question—namely, what was the use of the Standing Orders Committee if it was not to be allowed to exercise its discretion in suspending the Standing Orders when the reason for doing so seemed sufficient? When they met this year to consider the question of the suspension of the Standing Order, the Members present were equally divided in opinion—five being in favour of suspension and five against. The result was that, in accordance with the practice of Committees, the suspension was negatived. It was said that considerable delay had arisen between the decision of the Committee and the Motion which he had now to make, and he could quite understand that cases might arise in which great hardship might occur to owners of land and other parties affected by the revival of a Bill such as this after it had been disposed of; but if their Lordships would take the trouble to look into the matter they would see that there was really no very serious opposition to the scheme at all. The only serious opposition of which Notice had been given was that of the East and West India Docks Company, on the other side of the river, which was described last year as the opposition shop over the way. He could not, therefore, believe that the delay of two or three months which had taken place would in any way affect injuriously any of the opponents of the Bill. If that was the case, and the Standing Orders Committee of both Houses had been unable to come to a decision adverse to the Bill, he thought he was entitled to press upon their Lordships the consideration so eloquently urged by the noble Marquess below him (the Marquess of Salisbury last year. They all sympathized with those who were suffering from the prevailing distress, and he would ask the Chairman of Committees to temper justice with mercy, and look at the question as one which would affect large bodies of distressed artisans.

He desired also to appeal to noble Lords on the Front Government Bench to support his Motion. He would remind them that early in the Session Mr. Mundella, in reply to a Motion which was brought forward to promote the construction of harbours of refuge in order to give employment to distressed workmen, said that, although he could not hold out any hopes that public works would be originated for that purpose, yet he did believe that it was the duty of the Government to encourage to the best of their ability any private enterprise which would give promise of employment to men who were out of work. Under all the circumstances, and notwithstanding the infringement of a small technical rule, he hoped their Lordships would allow the Bill to be remitted to the Standing Orders Committee.

Moved, "That the Examiners' Certificate of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee."—(The Earl Cadogan.)

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE, in supporting the Motion, remarked that the pressure of distress in that part of Kent where it was proposed to carry out the works was very great.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, he was one of the Members of the Standing Orders Committee who opposed the Bill being proceeded with. This Bill was opposed, and he did not think it right to discriminate as to the character of the opposition at the present stage. This or a similar Bill was introduced the Session before last, and it was then dropped. Last Session it was again introduced, and the Standing Orders Committee had to consider it with reference to a breach of the Standing Orders as regarded the deposit required. The noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition moved that it should be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee, and there was considerable discussion, and the preponderance of feeling was against sending the Bill back. Now, their Lordships were asked to take a similar course on the 1st of June, although the Standing Orders Committee reported so long ago as the 16th of March. If the Motion were agreed to it would have a very prejudicial effect on Private Bill legislation in the future. A Bill would no sooner be rejected on the Standing Orders than the promoters would indulge in Lobbying in the hope of getting some Peer to move that it be reconsidered; and thus there would cease to be any finality in their decisions. No strong reason was given why the Standing Orders should be suspended in this case. It would be setting a very inconvenient precedent to send this Bill back after so long time had elapsed since the Report of the Standing Orders Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Duke of BUCKINGHAM and CHANDOS) said, he was not a Member of the Standing Orders Committee when this Bill came before them; but since Notice was given of this Motion he had considered it his duty to look into the matter, and it seemed to him it would be rather a dangerous precedent for the House after this long lapse of time—two and a-half months—when the Report was presented to require that the matter should be reopened by the Standing Orders Committee. It was an invidious task to oppose the progress of a Bill the passing of which was very likely to give a considerable amount of labour in the East of London; but certain Rules had been laid down by the Standing Orders Committee, and they were well known to these promoters of these undertakings. They knew very well that their bona fides had to be attested by the making of a deposit by a certain day in January. In this case the deposit was not made until late in February; and the promoters could not have erred in ignorance, because they paid the penalty for making the same mistake last year. The Bill was considered to be at an end in March last, and it was now proposed to be revived in June. They were told that if their Lordships assented to the Motion, and the Bill were passed, the work would be pushed forward. But if there was a difficulty in the matter of the deposit there was likely to be a greater difficulty in finding the capital. He hoped their Lordships would not take the extreme step of referring back the Bill to the Standing Orders Committee.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that, as one of the Standing Orders Committee, he felt very strongly the argument based on the length of time that had elapsed; but, in consistency with the vote which he gave in the Committee, he felt bound to support the Motion. The postponement of the deposit before the Committee had decided did not appear to him of sufficient importance to justify them in stopping the progress of the Bill. At the same time, he must deprecate the argument that they ought to pass the Bill because it would give employment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that having taken part in the matter last year, he had been consulted about bringing the matter forward at an earlier period, and he had recommended delay on two grounds. The first was that it seemed very undesirable to discuss the question in the then absence of the late Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale), who felt very strongly on the subject. His second reason for delay was that a Select Committee had been appointed, on the Motion of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, which was to deal with the question of the payment of interest out of capital, and he thought that that Committee might deal also with the question of the deposit. The delay, therefore, was not the fault of the promoters; it was his own. The injury to the opponents of the Bill before the Committee was infinitesimal, and there was no reason why they should not state the grounds of opposition in the second week of June as well as in the second week of May. He regretted very much that some noble Lords regarded with something like horror the idea that if this Bill gave employment that was some ground for setting aside a Standing Order. What were their Standing Orders? Had they been brought down by Moses from the Mount that they were to be regarded as so sacred? It was a matter of relative importance; and the question was whether the suspending of the Standing Order on the one side or the interests involved on the other were the more important. Instead of making the deposit on a day in January, it was made on a day in February. Was that a matter of such extreme importance? On the other hand, was it not carrying too far their reverence for the Standing Orders that, rather than suspend one of them, they would allow to be lost a Bill which would set on foot a work that would not only be of value to the Port of London, but would, in a time of grievous distress, give employment to 7,000 people? Why, the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer) would, by-and-bye, ask them to suspend a Standing Order, and no one would protest. In a matter of this kind they must view the importance of the Standing Order on the one side, and the interests affected on the other. Their Standing Orders were not so slight that they should be set on one side on every occasion, and not so sacred that they ought never to set them aside at all. The case had changed enormously since last year. Last year they were asked to revise the Report of their Standing Orders Committee; but this year they had no Report; the Committee had given only the former answer—presumitur pro negante. He asked their Lordships only to look at the case as it would appear to those whom their refusal would deprive of bread. Now that they were without work for a considerable time, the reason that would present itself to them while their families were starving and their homes desolate was that it was thought necessary to punish a capitalist for having been a month late in making a deposit in accordance with the Standing Orders. He was all for enforcing discipline among promoters, but that might be done at too great a cost; and he thought that, considering the Committee on Standing Orders was so divided that no Report was made, their Lordships ought to afford an opportunity of considering the matter once for all before arriving at a decision.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley) said, he thought it would have been more convenient if the noble Marquess, or one of his Friends, had given Notice of their intention to move in this matter. He felt most fully, as the noble Duke at the Table had felt, the invidiousness of inviting their Lordships to adhere to their Standing Order, and he felt it still more after the speech of the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess had addressed to them an appeal to the passions and feelings of the people, asking what would be the opinion of starving men when they were prevented from getting work and earning wages by a Standing Order of the House. He thought that was an unfair pressure to put upon the House. It was an unjust thing for any noble Lord to put such arguments to them and place them in such a position. It was a great temptation to noble Lords to shrink from their duty when such arguments were addressed to them. Last year he had said that they ought to support the late Chairman in his decision, and he now thought they ought to support the present Chairman. As the matter stood, he must come to the conclusion to give his vote in favour of the noble Chairman's view. When the noble Marquess spoke of this being a mere matter of unpunctuality, he could only say that nearly the whole of the Standing Orders of the House depended on the question of punctuality. He greatly regretted that anyone should feel himself compelled to impede any work which was useful on account of a technical Rule; but, on the other hand, he believed these Rules had very great weight and utility in protecting the House from great abuses, and for that reason he felt it to be his duty to support the noble Chairman.

HILLHEAD AND KELVINSIDE (ANNEXATION TO GLASGOW) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BALFOUR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was very sorry that it was his duty to trouble their Lordships with another discussion upon a matter of Private Business; but his apology was it was impossible without serious delay to the interests of those promoting the Bill that the discussion should be postponed. Their Lordships were aware that the Chairman of Committees did not usually move the second reading of a Private Bill when Notice of opposition was given, and the promoters of this Bill had therefore asked him, as being acquainted with the circumstances of the case, to state the matter to their Lordships. He was aware that their Lordships were anxious to get to the other Business upon the Paper, therefore he should endeavour to state what he had to say as briefly as he possibly could consistently with putting the case clearly before the House. The case was this. Glasgow was a large city, as their Lordships knew, which was surrounded by several small burghs, and in some respects the interests of these burghs and the City of Glasgow were from time to time in antagonism. This was not a new matter, but he must confess that he did not know and could not imagine on what grounds the second reading of the Bill was opposed. It seemed to him that upon all grounds it was a matter which should be referred for consideration to a Committee upstairs. There had been many contests upon similar Bills to this one, and in the large majority of cases those contests had been relegated to a Committee upstairs. His plea was that they should pass the second reading, and let the Bill be fought out in a Committee. He might tell their Lordships that this Bill had already passed the House of Commons. The second reading was passed without any such opposition as that which threatened it now. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, before which it was contested upon eight days, and ultimately it was passed unanimously by the Committee. That being so, what ground there could be for opposing the Bill, at this stage, he was quite at a loss to imagine. What the Bill sought to establish was the annexation of two districts to the City of Glasgow—the districts of Kelvin-side and Hillhead. The population of Kelvinside was as nearly unanimous as it was possible for a population to be for union with Glasgow. They wanted a settled government; they wanted the advantage of the police of Glasgow and all the other advantages which towns and cities enjoyed. They had at present a great many different jurisdictions. He did not think those who were opposing the Bill would contradict him when he said the population of Kelvinside was nearly unanimous for the annexation, and he did not think he overstated the case when he said that so far as the burgh of Hillhead was concerned the population was very nearly equally divided. He believed he could claim a small majority for annexation to Glasgow; but he would not press the matter so far as that, but would merely say that it was proved before the Committee of the Commons that the population of Hillhead was about equally divided. There would be, of course, if the Bill went to a Committee, the usual sort of allegations made on the one side and on the other; but he would abstain from saying a word about the merits on this occasion,

for with such knowledge as he had of Private Bill affairs, he thought he might say, without fear of contradiction, that there was nothing so inconvenient as to discuss the details of a Private Bill in the Whole House. Therefore, he should say nothing about the merits of the Bill; but he should ask their Lordships to allow him this indulgence—that if any one on the opposite side went into the merits, he should be at liberty to answer any point that was material. He did not think the noble Marquess the Marquess of Tweeddale, who was to move the rejection of the Bill, would go into the merits. He (Lord Balfour) could say that he felt with the full weight of any authority that he possessed that this was a matter to which justice could not be done except by a Committee having the advantage of the sworn testimony of the witnesses, and all the assistance that counsel on both sides could properly give. There was no opposition of this kind in the House of Commons; and he was quite at a loss to know why now, when the only public body, as far as he knew, who were opposing the Bill on its merits were the Commissioners of the Burgh of Hillhead, they should have recourse to the very unusual measure of raising opposition on the second reading. He had seen a Paper that had been circulated, he believed, at the instance of the Hillhead Commissioners, in which they made the allegation that if their Lordships passed the second reading of the Bill they would be going contrary to the principles laid down in the Burgh Police and Health Scotland Bill, which their Lordships passed earlier in the Session. As some of their Lordships knew, he was on the Committee that passed the Bill; and he said emphatically that they would not be going contrary to any principle laid down in that Bill. It was true, when that Bill was first introduced into this House, there was a clause in it giving power to large Corporations like Glasgow to annex a smaller burgh after certain procedure, and without the consent of the Commissioners of that burgh or of the population; but the Committee to which their Lordships referred that Bill struck out that power, for they thought that in a Public Bill of that kind no power should be given which would allow Corporations to override the decisions of a Private Bill Committee; but they did that solely to keep the matter open. He spoke for himself, but he believed that that was the ground on which the Committee came to the decision. The Committee did not wish to express any opinion as to whether it was right or wrong for one burgh to annex another; but simply, if that was to be done, it should be done after full and proper procedure in the usual way, and not in any side way by means of a clause in a Public Bill. The only other allegation which he thought could be made against the Bill was that there was no exact precedent for it. He was not quite sure whether there was any precedent which was exactly on all fours with it; but there were some which were extremely like it—in fact, so like it as to be nearly indistinguishable. He was stating what was within his own knowledge when he said that part of the burgh of Partick, under government exactly the same as the burgh of Hillhead, was annexed by Glasgow contrary to the wish of the Commissioners of Partick. If a precedent were wanted, that formed an almost exact precedent for what their Lordships were now asked to do. It was the very commonest thing for parts of one district to be annexed to a burgh without the consent of the Governing Body of the district from which these parts were taken; and it was the commonest thing that the opposition should be referred to a Private Bill Committee, and there discussed, each case being threshed out on its merits. He held in his hand a long list of cases in which that had been done. He would not trouble their Lordships with it, because he was quite certain the principle would not be disputed, and also because, as he had already told their Lordships, he was very anxious to shorten this discussion as far as he could without doing injury to the interests which had been committed to his care. On the whole, he urged their Lordships to take what he thought they would agree with him was the right and proper course—to read the Bill a second time, and to let it be referred to a Select Committee in the ordinary way, in order that the whole question should be thoroughly threshed out. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2'."

to support the late Chairman in his decision, and he now thought they ought to support the present Chairman. As the matter stood, he must come to the conclusion to give his vote in favour of the noble Chairman's view. When the noble Marquess spoke of this being a mere matter of unpunctuality, he could only say that nearly the whole of the Standing Orders of the House depended on the question of punctuality. He greatly regretted that anyone should feel himself compelled to impede any work which was useful on account of a technical Rule; but, on the other hand, he believed these Rules had very great weight and utility in protecting the House from great abuses, and for that reason he felt it to be his duty to support the noble Chairman.

HILLHEAD AND KELVINSIDE (ANNEXATION TO GLASGOW) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BALFOUR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was very sorry that it was his duty to trouble their Lordships with another discussion upon a matter of Private Business; but his apology was it was impossible without serious delay to the interests of those promoting the Bill that the discussion should be postponed. Their Lordships were aware that the Chairman of Committees did not usually move the second reading of a Private Bill when Notice of opposition was given, and the promoters of this Bill had therefore asked him, as being acquainted with the circumstances of the case, to state the matter to their Lordships. He was aware that their Lordships were anxious to get to the other Business upon the Paper, therefore he should endeavour to state what he had to say as briefly as he possibly could consistently with putting the case clearly before the House. The case was this. Glasgow was a large city, as their Lordships knew, which was surrounded by several small burghs, and in some respects the interests of these burghs and the City of Glasgow were from time to time in antagonism. This was not a new matter, but he must confess that he did not know and could not imagine on what grounds the second reading of the Bill was opposed. It seemed to him that upon all grounds it was a matter which should be referred for consideration to a Committee upstairs. There had been many contests upon similar Bills to this one, and in the large majority of cases those contests had been relegated to a Committee upstairs. His plea was that they should pass the second reading, and let the Bill be fought out in a Committee. He might tell their Lordships that this Bill had already passed the House of Commons. The second reading was passed without any such opposition as that which threatened it now. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, before which it was contested upon eight days, and ultimately it was passed unanimously by the Committee. That being so, what ground there could be for opposing the Bill, at this stage, he was quite at a loss to imagine. What the Bill sought to establish was the annexation of two districts to the City of Glasgow—the districts of Kelvin-side and Hillhead. The population of Kelvinside was as nearly unanimous as it was possible for a population to be for union with Glasgow. They wanted a settled government; they wanted the advantage of the police of Glasgow and all the other advantages which towns and cities enjoyed. They had at present a great many different jurisdictions. He did not think those who were opposing the Bill would contradict him when he said the population of Kelvinside was nearly unanimous for the annexation, and he did not think he overstated the case when he said that so far as the burgh of Hillhead was concerned the population was very nearly equally divided. He believed he could claim a small majority for annexation to Glasgow; but he would not press the matter so far as that, but would merely say that it was proved before the Committee of the Commons that the population of Hillhead was about equally divided. There would be, of course, if the Bill went to a Committee, the usual sort of allegations made on the one side and on the other; but he would abstain from saying a word about the merits on this occasion,

for with such knowledge as he had of Private Bill affairs, he thought he might say, without fear of contradiction, that there was nothing so inconvenient as to discuss the details of a Private Bill in the Whole House. Therefore, he should say nothing about the merits of the Bill; but he should ask their Lordships to allow him this indulgence—that if anyone on the opposite side went into the merits, he should be at liberty to answer any point that was material. He did not think the noble Marquess the Marquess of Tweeddale, who was to move the rejection of the Bill, would go into the merits. He (Lord Balfour) could say that he felt with the full weight of any authority that he possessed that this was a matter to which justice could not be done except by a Committee having the advantage of the sworn testimony of the witnesses, and all the assistance that counsel on both sides could properly give. There was no opposition of this kind in the House of Commons; and he was quite at a loss to know why now, when the only public body, as far as he knew, who were opposing the Bill on its merits were the Commissioners of the Burgh of Hillhead, they should have recourse to the very unusual measure of raising opposition on the second reading. He had seen a Paper that had been circulated, he believed, at the instance of the Hillhead Commissioners, in which they made the allegation that if their Lordships passed the second reading of the Bill they would be going contrary to the principles laid down in the Burgh Police and Health Scotland Bill, which their Lordships passed earlier in the Session. As some of their Lordships knew, he was on the Committee that passed the Bill; and he said emphatically that they would not be going contrary to any principle laid down in that Bill. It was true, when that Bill was first introduced into this House, there was a clause in it giving power to large Corporations like Glasgow to annex a smaller burgh after certain procedure, and without the consent of the Commissioners of that burgh or of the population; but the Committee to which their Lordships referred that Bill struck out that power, for they thought that in a Public Bill of that kind no power should be given which would allow Corporations to override the decisions of a Private Bill Committee; but they did that solely to keep the matter open. He spoke for himself, but he believed that that was the ground on which the Committee came to the decision. The Committee did not wish to express any opinion as to whether it was right or wrong for one burgh to annex another; but simply, if that was to be done, it should be done after full and proper procedure in the usual way, and not in any side way by means of a clause in a Public Bill. The only other allegation which he thought could be made against the Bill was that there was no exact precedent for it. He was not quite sure whether there was any precedent which was exactly on all fours with it; but there were some which were extremely like it—in fact, so like it as to be nearly indistinguishable. He was stating what was within his own knowledge when he said that part of the burgh of Partick, under government exactly the same as the burgh of Hillhead, was annexed by Glasgow contrary to the wish of the Commissioners of Partick. If a precedent were wanted, that formed an almost exact precedent for what their Lordships were now asked to do. It was the very commonest thing for parts of one district to be annexed to a burgh without the consent of the Governing Body of the district from which these parts were taken; and it was the commonest thing that the opposition should be referred to a Private Bill Committee, and there discussed, each case being threshed out on its merits. He held in his hand a long list of cases in which that had been done. He would not trouble their Lordships with it, because he was quite certain the principle would not be disputed, and also because, as he had already told their Lordships, he was very anxious to shorten this discussion as far as he could without doing injury to the interests which had been committed to his care. On the whole, he urged their Lordships to take what he thought they would agree with him was the right and proper course—to read the Bill a second time, and to let it be referred to a Select Committee in the ordinary way, in order that the whole question should be thoroughly threshed out. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

— The Lord Balfour.

THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE said, he would bespeak their Lordships' indulgence while he stated the grounds on which he ventured to ask their Lordships to defer the considering of this Bill to this day six months. He could assure their Lordships that he had not undertaken this duty with any pleasurable feeling. He had no wish to occupy the time of their Lordships' House, and he had only made this Motion on this occasion because he believed that to read this Bill a second time would be to establish a most inconvenient, not to say dangerous, principle in connection with the very important question—very important in Scotland certainly—of the extension of the burgh boundaries in cases such as that in which Hillhead was situated in connection with Glasgow, and in the case of other burghs throughout Scotland. The objections he took to this Bill were twofold. One was to the manner in which it had been promoted, and the other was the decision which was come to in the other House. This Bill was to annex and incorporate with the City of Glasgow the police burgh of Hillhead and the district of Kelvinside, and for other purposes. On a Bill of this description he thought their Lordships—especially those of their Lordships who were acquainted with cases of this kind, and there had been several before their Lordships' House—would expect to find as promoters of it either the authorities of the district which was to be incorporated with Glasgow, or the authority of the burgh of Hillhead, or the authority of the burgh of Glasgow. Those Governing Bodies, or their representatives, were conspicuous in this case by their absence only, and in their place there were the names of two firms of solicitors, firms representing a handful of private and wholly irresponsible individuals who resided in Kelvinside and in Hillhead. In other words, their Lordships were asked at the instance of these irresponsible gentlemen to take in hand the abolition of a burgh of considerable size, with a population of between 8,000 and 9,000, and the valuation of which was £80,000; a burgh established by Act of Parliament, and against the management of which not a single word could be alleged. Their Lordships, he thought, would agree with him that that was a very preposterous thing. It was wholly unprecedented. He could say with confidence that in Scotland, at any rate, there was no example of a Bill whose object was the abolition of a police burgh being promoted by any others than the authorities of the burgh itself. In respect to the mode in which the Bill was promoted it was absolutely without precedent. It was most undesirable and most unreasonable that a burgh constituted by Act of Parliament should be exposed to be assailed by private individuals who happened to think it would be desirable to annex it to Glasgow or some other burgh, and who were able to employ a solicitor in order to have that carried out. He relied on that as his first ground why their Lordships should not read the Bill a second time, for if they were to read it a second time a most objectionable principle would be established. The next ground on which he asked their Lordships to reject this Bill was not altogether the same. It was this, that the decision which had been come to upon this question of the annexation of Hillhead was opposed to every decision which had been come to by Parliament, whether in the House of Commons or in the House of Lords. It was opposed to every decision which had been come to upon the question of the extension of burghs and of the annexation of one burgh to another. The first occasion on which Parliament had expressed its opinion as to how these annexations should take place would be found in the Act of 1857. That Act was described as "An Act to provide for the extension of boundaries of burghs in Scotland," and he referred to it because for the first time it laid down what Parliament then considered the proper mode of dealing with such questions. This Act required the sanction, in the case of a burgh, of a Town Council, and, in the case of a county, of the regular constituted authority, and the mode of annexation was surrounded by many other provisions, such as going before the Sheriff; but he need not further refer to them. After that, from the year 1868 to the year 1879, there were no less than four Bills promoted by the Glasgow Corporation, each of which had the object of annexing either for Parliamentary or municipal purposes some burgh or burghs in the neighbourhood of the city. He said, without fear of contradiction, that in every instance in which pro-motors failed to show that the constituted authorities were in favour of annexation, in every single instance, whether the Bill was in "another place" or before their Lordships, the Bill was rejected. He now came to what occurred last year in connection with the Burgh Police Bill. The same question arose under that Bill, because the Bill as introduced, so far as he could remember, contained a clause which laid down this rule, that where burghs wished to be united they should proceed by Act of Parliament—that was to say, in each case the authorities should make joint application for annexation. This question was fully discussed before their Lordships' Committee. The representatives of the City of Glasgow were present, also the representatives of the smaller burghs, and it really became a question as to which was the best mode of dealing with this question. The representatives of the City of Glasgow contended they were entitled to go behind the authorities of the burgh, and ascertain for themselves—by means of signatures obtained by canvassers—whether the burgh was desirous to be annexed to them. The representatives of the burghs contended that was not a fair mode of obtaining the opinion of the burghs, as it was in practice open to very great abuse. After hearing all that was to be said upon the question, the Committee decided in favour of the mode recommended by the smaller burghs—namely, that annexation should only be made upon the joint application of the authorities of both the burghs seeking for incorporation. The net result of what had occurred in Parliament during the last 30 years was this, that Parliament had insisted as a condition of annexation or extension of boundaries that in every instance the consent of the burgh to be annexed should be a condition antecedent to the annexation. He made this statement without fear of contradiction, and he held that it was a very reasonable and proper arrangement; but whether it were proper or not, it was the decision which Parliament had come to, and was consistent with every decision which had been given since 1857. From his knowledge of the burgh of Hillhead and of the district of Kelvinside, it was right he should say that it was not contended by anyone who knew the facts that the sanction of the authorities of Hillhead had been obtained. On the contrary, it was true that every one of the Commissioners of Police of that burgh were opposed to this annexation; and, moreover, the ratepayers were not in favour of it in the burgh of Hillhead. Were they in favour of it in the district of Kelvinside? The figures that he would now place before their Lordships they might rely upon as being strictly accurate. In the burgh of Hillhead there were 1,692 ratepayers, and of this number 671 signatures had been obtained by canvassers sent about by the irresponsible gentlemen to whom he had referred. But that was not even on paper a majority of the ratepayers. Taking Kelvinside, he found there were 890 ratepayers, of whom 390 only had signed their names in favour of this measure, and in this case the figures of those who were supporting the Bill had been accepted as accurate. He, therefore, in face of the Act of Parliament of 1857, to which he had referred, in view of the decisions given from 1868 to 1879, and in view of the decision given last year by the Committee of their Lordships' House on the Burgh and Police Bill, and of the fact that that Bill passed their Lordships' House a short time ago, he said that in view of all this, and having regard to the nature of the opposition set up against the Bill, he was entitled to ask their Lordships to reject this Bill on the grounds he had stated. There was only one ground upon which this Bill could be supported, and that was not a sound one. The only thing said in favour of compelling the burgh of Hillhead as well as the district of Kelvinside to be annexed to Glasgow was that if it were not done a certain arrangement entered into by the City of Glasgow and the shareholders of the Royal Botanic Gardens of Glasgow would fall to the ground. He had two observations to make regarding that view, and the first was that he failed to see any connection whatever between an arrangement entered into by the City of Glasgow and the shareholders of the Royal Botanic Gardens and the question of incorporating and annexing the burgh of Hillhead and district of Kelvinside. They appeared to him to be questions that had no connection whatever, and should have none; but his next objection was this, that it was altogether untrue to say that the agreement, which he had no doubt was a very proper agreement in itself, would fall to the ground, or at any rate must fall to the ground, if this Bill was not allowed to pass. He held in his hand an Act of Parliament which was described as a Glasgow Public Parks Act, and Clause 23 of this Act provided for this very contingency, the very contingency of the shareholders and owners of the Royal Botanic Gardens wishing to hand them over to the City of Glasgow. He would not trouble their Lordships with more than a few words, but the clause said that the Lord Provost, &c., might enter into agreement on such terms as might be considered convenient for the transfer of the Royal Botanic Gardens. There was nothing in the Hillhead Bill with regard to these Gardens that could not be equally well carried out through the medium of this Act of Parliament; and one, therefore, could not help coming to the conclusion that the City of Glasgow, in threatening to extinguish the Royal Botanic Gardens by selling them up, had some ulterior object that they did not wish to declare. It would almost seem as if, having lent to the authorities of the Gardens a sum of £47,000, they were threatening to use their power as mortgagees, with the view of compelling the burgh of Hillhead to come under the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, and this although the property in question was worth more than double the amount advanced upon it. If that was so, and it was the only explanation he could find in favour of the Bill, he thought it was not altogether creditable to the City of Glasgow, and perhaps it accounted for the fact that the names of its authorities were not upon the back of the Bill, though he was informed they were really its promoters. He had now said all he wished to say upon this subject. He had desired to explain to their Lordships that the second reading of the Bill would establish a very inconvenient precedent—namely, that of a Bill being promoted by irresponsible persons for the abolition of a burgh, against whose administration nothing could be even alleged, far less proved. To pass the second reading of such a Bill would, he considered, be establishing a most undesirable precedent, and he begged, therefore, to move its rejection.

The Marquess of Tweeddale

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Marquess of Tweeddale.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he thought it had perhaps not escaped the attention of their Lordships that the arguments that had been used by the noble Marquess who had just sat down were precisely those arguments that must naturally come before a Committee. They were almost all of that character, and especially so in regard to the last item of his noble Friend's speech—the reference to the Botanic Gardens, near Glasgow. No doubt, it was a matter of great importance; but he did not profess to understand the whole of the case, although he knew something of it, and he therefore thought this also was one of the matters that should go before a Committee. He knew something of the locality and of the people resident in both, and he had seen and considered the representations of deputations from both burghs, and he had still some doubts upon the subject. He wanted the Bill to go before a Committee for elucidation. The argument against the Bill was that no case of annexation should be allowed unless applied for by the joint constituted authorities of both parties, and that Parliament had decided this point. That, however, was not the case, because there was no such law. A clause was struck out of a Bill which would have given undue facilities to great cities like Glasgow for annexation; but no other clause was inserted forbidding annexation. Taking a wide view of the case, he thought it was precisely one of those matters that ought to go before a Committee. Therefore, he hoped they would give the Bill a second reading.

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, that to throw out the Bill on the second reading was a high-handed proceeding which their Lordships would reserve to themselves only on the vicious principle of the Bill being satisfactorily proved. He hoped that unprecedented and unexpected course would not commend itself to their Lordships' House; but that they would agree with the noble Duke and the noble Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill that this was exactly one of those cases which were eminently adapted for inquiry before a Committee of their Lordships' House. What was really the principle of this Bill? It was one which had been asserted over and over again by Parliamentary sanction—namely, that the identity of interest and benefit which extended to what was particularly the population of one community, should also apply to the burden and obligation. That was the whole principle at which this Bill aimed; and when their Lordships were asked to reject the Bill, they were asked to set aside not only the wish of a very large portion of the people of the districts to be annexed, but they were also setting aside the wish of so respectable an authority as the Corporation of Glasgow. The noble Marquess said the Corporation of Glasgow had taken no part in this matter. He could hardly conceive a more significant part for the Corporation to take than to undertake the expenses before Parliament, as the Corporation had done. Kelvinside and Hillhead were just as much part of the City of Glasgow as St. Pancras was part of the City of London, and they were inhabited by persons carrying on business in Glasgow. The people went out to these suburbs to live for the sake of better air and better houses. The aggregation of the population led to complicated machinery in the shape of local bodies and local trusts of all kinds, and it hardly seemed right that the persons who created the necessity for that kind of legislation and machinery in Glasgow should escape all responsibility in the matter from the mere fact of living in Kelvinside. The anomaly was increased when they remembered that if the House threw out this Bill on the second reading they would not only be affirming the continuance of that state of affairs, but flying in the face of the very people who wished to take their proper share in the responsibility for the burdens of the people of the City of Glasgow. It had been said that the promoters of this Bill, as far as Kelvinside was concerned, were not very responsible gentlemen; well, he believed Kelvinside had no burgh authority of its own, but the bulk of the population of Kelvinside were entirely in favour of this annexation. He admitted, as far as Hillhead went, opinion might be a little balanced; but that surely was a matter which would be brought out in Committee before their Lordships. The noble Marquess also quoted the Act of 1857. The Act of 1857 would be perfectly unworkable for the present measure. The Act of 1857 referred entirely to the extension of municipal burghs, and this was a question of the absorption of one burgh into another. Moreover, that Act was 30 years old, and since its passing legislation had been incumbered by all kinds of other Acts, which would make it impossible to take the power under that Act necessary for the present purpose. As to the Botanic Gardens, that matter, it was urged, was provided for in the Act of 1878; but although under Clause 27 of the Act of 1878 the City of Glasgow took power to take over the Royal Botanic Gardens, they did not take any power of assessment, and they declined altogether to exercise that Act unless Kelvinside and Hillhead were thrown into the Corporation of the City of Glasgow. Very naturally they did not care further to assess the people of Glasgow for Gardens which were not situated in the burgh which was under their jurisdiction. He hoped their Lordships would read this Bill a second time.

LORD WATSON said, he thought it would be very unfortunate indeed in the municipal interests of the larger burghs of Scotland if their Lordships were to refuse the second reading of this Bill upon the principle set forward by the noble Marquess. He did not intend to follow the noble Marquess into the facts of the case, and that for the best of all reasons, that he was not intimately acquainted with them, and he presumed that in that respect he was in the same position as the majority of the Members of this House. This application was made to Parliament at the instance of a large body of inhabitants and ratepayers within an area of about 800 acres. Considerably less than one-sixth part of that area was under municipal government, and consisted of the small burgh of Hillhead, which was constituted under the Act of 1862. In this case the promoters did not say that their present civic rulers were not doing their best as far as their powers enabled them; but what they did say was that they could not give those advantages which the Corporation of Glasgow could give to all the inhabitants of the district if this union which the promoters sought was accomplished. If that was proved, union would be right and expedient, and he would be very much surprised if the House were to affirm that, notwithstanding the expediency, there should be no union, simply because there had existed within that area a small civic authority. The decision that was come to by the other House did not furnish sufficient data for their Lordships giving a decision on that point; but, at the same time, there was one fact which could not be disregarded in considering whether the Bill ought not to be sent to a Committee. A Committee of the other House did come to the conclusion that the case of the promoters had been made out. He did not say it necessarily followed that this House would come to the same decision; but prima facie it appeared to him to show that the promoters had at least come here not entirely without a case.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Earl of Dalhousie) said, his noble friend who moved the rejection of the Bill based his case partly on principle and partly on precedent. The principle, he understood, was drawn from the Act of 1857, and also the proceedings of the Select Committee to which the Burgh Health Bill was referred, and of which he (the Earl of Dalhousie) had the honour to be Chairman. If this Bill had originated in this House, there might perhaps have been a great deal to be said for the view of the noble Marquess; but the House must remember, as had been pointed out by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Watson), that this Bill had already been considered by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, that it had passed through all its stages in that House, and that after all that had taken place it had now come before their Lordships. It would, therefore, be creating a precedent which, if not entirely new, would certainly be a very strange precedent, to reject without consideration, and on the second reading, a Private Bill the merits of which depended so largely on facts and details that could be adequately considered only by a Select Committee. He hoped the House would not take that course, but that they would give the Bill a second reading. He pronounced no opinion on the merits of the case, or upon the possible rejection or acceptance of the Bill by the Select Committee. He submitted that that was a matter which ought to be left entirely to the Select Committee. The noble Marquess pushed his argument as to principle rather far. The noble Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill stated very correctly what took place in the Select Committee. The noble Duke also gave an account of what took place, as did also the noble Marquess. As Chairman of that Committee, he (the Earl of Dalhousie) was in the happy position of being able to agree with all three so far as the facts were concerned. But when the noble Marquess drew from what took place in the Select Committee an argument to this effect — that the principle which they introduced and embodied in that Bill was for ever after to prevent the annexation by larger burghs of adjoining burghs on any other principle than that there laid down, and when he remembered the Bill had not yet become law, he must confess that the arguments as to principle were considerably weakened. On the ground that this Bill had been considered by the House of Commons, and had come before their Lordships for second reading, he thought it would be against precedent if their Lordships did not read it a second time.

ARMS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 129.)

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Earl SPENCER): I rise, my Lords, to ask your Lordships to read this Bill a second time. It is merely a Continuance Bill of the measure passed in 1881, with some slight alterations, which I shall refer to shortly. It is not the first time I have had to address your Lordships on a Bill of this kind. At the same time, it will only be right that I should refer shortly to the provisions of the Bill, describe the effect of them, and state why the Government consider it necessary to pass such a Bill now. An Arms Bill has never been treated in this House, or in the other, as a measure of first-rate political importance; but such measures are of very considerable importance with reference to the enforcement of law and order and the protection of life and property in Ireland. The object of the Bill is to regulate the importation of arms into Ireland, and to regulate the holding and the carrying of arms by various people in the country; and it is also a Bill for the regulation of the sale of arms and of ammunition in Ireland. In its operation a measure of this sort is a matter of very considerable importance. It prevents the importation of arms for those who have rebellious designs against Her Majesty's Government. It also prevents the promiscuous carrying of arms, and in that way it checks to a great extent any disposition there may be at times to commit outrages and acts of violence. No doubt, it may be said that no premeditated case of murder has been prevented by the Arms Act. If one individual has a spite against another and determines to commit an act of violence he can always obtain weapons whether there is an Arms Act in force or not. But it must be admitted that the existence of an Act requiring persons to have licences for the possession of arms does, to a great extent, impede the evil purposes of such men, and, indeed, to a certain extent, does check the commission of those murderous crimes which from time to time have been a disgrace to Ireland. There is a third reason why this important check should be put upon the carrying of arms in that country, and it is that in times of great excitement there is a tendency, if there is no check on the carrying of arms, on the part of persons in all classes of the population to carry arms. They carry revolvers to fairs and markets, and also to large meetings where there is considerable excitement. If there is excitement in the country the fact that many persons go about carrying arms greatly adds to the danger to life and increases the possibility of serious outrage and disturbance. It is on this account that Her Majesty's Government have thought it necessary to bring in this Bill. They do not consider they would be justified, when there is great uncertainty as to political affairs in Ireland and there may be great excitement in the country, to add a serious danger to life in that country by allowing the promiscuous carriage of arms. I am happy to think that the circumstances are not so grave as they were in 1881, when I had to introduce this measure to your Lordships. Serious crime does not prevail to such an extent in Ireland as it did then, and the general state of that country is quiet, although in some districts there is a considerable amount of disturbance and excitement. That there is some reason for what I say is shown by the statistics of serious offences. In the first four months of 1881 there were 556 serious offences reported by the police; and in the first four months of 1886 the number was only 184. In 1881 there were 75 prosecutions under the Arms Act; in the following year there were 127; and during the portion of the present year which has passed there have been 51 prosecutions and 44 convictions. There are 28 counties which are wholly or partially proclaimed under the expiring Act; and Antrim, Londonderry, Louth, and Wicklow are the only counties where no proclamation is in force. A proclamation may relate to the holding and carrying of arms, or only to the carrying of arms; and in 10 counties the proclamation is against the carrying of arms. There has been since 1882 a considerable diminution in the number of prosecutions and convictions under the Act. The modifications in the Continuance Bill are twofold. By the Act of 1881 two magistrates might grant a licence for the holding of arms to an occupier living in the Petty Sessional district. This provision was first introduced in 1875, when I drew attention to it. Although I did not divide against it, I made certain objections to the proposal. The provision was reintroduced in the Act 1881. The Government think it is better left out, as it throws a heavy responsibility on the magistrates in any district. In some cases it has been found that they have not the courage to refuse licences to persons who had better have been without them. When that is done there is no remedy but that of revoking the licences through the Lord Lieutenant. I need hardly say that is an invidious task, and it can only be done in extreme cases. It has, therefore, been thought advisable to leave the granting of licences entirely to the Resident Magistrates, who are less subject to local and personal influences. Another Amendment which has been introduced in "another place," is that a Court dealing with a prosecution under this Act shall consist, not of ordinary magistrates, but of two or more Resident Magistrates. This Amendment was assented to after some consideration. It was thought better to leave the adjudication of these somewhat difficult cases to the Resident Magistrates rather than to the local Justices. In the uncertainty prevailing with regard to Ireland, Her Majesty's Government could not take the responsibility of allowing the Act to drop; it is necessary to increase the safety of life and property in Ireland. If your Lordships give a second reading to the Bill, I propose to ask you to suspend the Standing Order, in order that the Bill may go through the remaining stages and receive the Royal Assent this week. The Act of 1881 expires on this very day. Her Majesty's Government introduced the Bill in "another place," not expecting there would be any opposition to it; but opposition came from an unexpected quarter, and hence the Bill has been delayed. It is on that account I have to ask your Lordships to allow the Bill to pass its remaining stages, so that there may be no considerable interregnum between the expiry of the Act and the passing of this Bill. There is also another consideration. At the close of the week your Lordships will adjourn for the Holidays. With these brief remarks I beg to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

—The Lord President of the Council.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he rose to support the second reading of the Bill, believing that this exceptional legislation was necessary. Those who had paid any attention to the affairs of Ireland knew that when these Acts were allowed to expire crime increased. This happened in 1846, and again in 1880. His noble Friend who had just spoken occupied a most extraordinary position. On the one hand, they heard from the Head of the Government that repressive legislation had never fulfilled its object, while, on the other, they had the noble Earl urging forward this Bill as absolutely necessary for the protection of life and property in Ireland. The Bill was to expire on the 31st of December, 1887. When it was introduced the term was longer. Why had the Government consented to an alteration? In his opinion, the Government had assumed a very serious responsibility indeed in naming so early a date for the expiration of this Bill. They all knew what the programme about Ireland for the future was. They had it explained at the meeting of the Liberal Party recently. They knew it was proposed in the autumn to introduce a measure of immense importance affecting Ireland, and their Lordships must be fully aware that that Autumn Session must be taken up with the consideration of that measure in the other House of Parliament. It might come to this House in the Session of 1887. He could not anticipate what would follow; but any sensible man must admit the probability that there would be great political excitement both here and in Ireland just at the time when this Bill would expire, and the Government would add to this excitement the difficulty which always arose in the House of Commons when a measure such as that now before their Lordships was brought forward. The Government had assumed, as he had said, a very grave responsibility in this matter; but he did not think that their Lordships would feel inclined to assume a much graver responsibility by endeavouring to alter the Bill and so delay or risk its passing into law. The responsibility must rest with the Government. He should like to ask the Government whether they were satisfied that the provisions of this Bill would give all the necessary protection to Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland? The Prevention of Crime Act of 1882 expired at the end of last Session, and Mr. Gladstone's Government came to the conclusion that they would propose the renewal of some of the clauses of that Act. When the noble Marquess opposite assumed the Government on Mr. Gladstone's resignation he endeavoured to administer the affairs of Ireland without renewing the Act, and it lapsed at the end of the Session of 1885. The noble Marquess subsequently, at the beginning of this Session, indicated that, in the opinion of the Government over which he presided, it was desirable that some measure of the kind should be introduced. But the Government were defeated before any form was given to the noble Marquess's announcement. In the course of the debate on the Address his noble Friend who was now President of the Council made a speech from the other side of the House, in which he expressed the opinion that, so far as he knew, at the beginning of this year the state of affairs in Ireland was such as to render it necessary to consider the propriety of renewing some of the clauses of that Act. On this subject he wished to say that Members of the Government had used an argument which he did not think any of their Lordships would accept. The Prime Minister, in moving the second reading of the Government of Ireland Bill said, that the position of the noble Marquess last year in deciding not to introduce a measure to renew the provisions of the Crimes Act had "immense historic weight, the effect of which never could be effaced." His noble Friend (Earl Spencer) had used similar language. He was bound to say that he thought that the importance attributed to the noble Marquess's conduct had been immensely exaggerated by the Government, and he did not see how the course of action which the noble Marquess marked out for his Government could be considered to have that momentous effect which the present Government had attributed to it. The Government had been curiously oblivious of two remarkable precedents on the matter. In 1846 there was a combination between the Whigs and the Protectionists, the proposal for an Arms Bill, not unlike the one now before their Lordships, made by Sir Robert Peel, was defeated, and Sir Robert Peel was turned out of Office. Lord John Russell succeeded him, and in the year 1847 did not feel himself debarred by what had taken place in the previous year from proposing what he thought was right in the matter. Lord John Russell proposed and carried a measure not very dissimilar to that which was defeated in 1846. But there was a precedent very much more recent. In the year 1880 the circumstances appeared to him to have been precisely the same as in the year 1885. Lord Beaconsfield in the year 1880 resigned his Office without proposing to Parliament to continue the Protection of Life and Property Act, which was about to expire. Mr. Gladstone, in 1885, resigned his Office under exactly the same circumstances; he did not propose to Parliament to continue the Prevention of Crime Act. In 1880, Mr. Gladstone, succeeding Lord Beaconsfield, determined to carry on the government of Ireland without making any proposals to Parliament for fresh legislation, and allowed the Act to lapse. In 1885 the noble Marquess opposite, succeeding Mr. Gladstone, took precisely the same course as Mr. Gladstone had taken in 1880, and decided to go on without proposing to Parliament the renewal of the Act, which therefore lapsed. What took place after? In 1881, Mr. Gladstone, who was then Prime Minister, decided to introduce a measure similar in character to that which in 1880 he had allowed to lapse; and in 1886 the noble Marquess opposite expressed his intention to carry out a policy of the same kind—namely, to propose to Parliament to renew the repressive legislation which had lapsed. But it was now argued by the Prime Minister that this made it quite impossible for him to take the same course which he did in 1881. The argument became still more unintelligible by the speech which his noble Friend the President of the Council had just delivered. What were their Lordships occupied in doing? They were actually occupied in discussing a measure of that very class of special legislation which the Prime Minister had said was rendered altogether impossible by the action of the noble Marquess last year. The Prime Minister stated that during the last 53 years special legislation for the protection of life and property in Ireland had been ineffectual. Upon that point he happened to be in a position to speak with some authority, because his Relative—Sir George Grey—who was Secretary of State for the Home Department for many years after 1846, had left him some important papers upon the subject. During 20 years of this period of 53 years—that was, from 1847 to 1866, except during a short time when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in 1848—the special legislation with regard to Ireland was practically very much of the same nature as the Bill now before their

Lordships. The Act passed in 1847 bore the name of the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Act, and in its main and most important provisions was simply an Arms Act. The rest gave power to place additional constabulary in districts, which it now turned out could be done without special legislation. The noble and learned Lord below the Gangway (Lord Fitz-Clarence), who was then Attorney General for Ireland, changed, in 1856, the name. Crime and Outrage Act, to Peace Preservation Act, as better expressing its object, and that Act was continued until 1870. Had it not effected its purpose? He had there a letter written by Sir George Grey to The Times some years ago, when the conduct of Lord John Russell's Government at the time was challenged, and he expressed his opinion as to the manner in which the Crime and Outrage Act succeeded. The passing of the Act, and the manner in which Lord Clarendon carried it out, produced the result intended. It reduced crime and outrage very much at a time of greater danger and difficulty than the present, when revolution broke out in Paris, and when Thrones were tumbling down all over Europe. This special legislation enabled the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim the City of Dublin, and produced such alarm among the disaffected that the men who, by the advice of Mitchell and of Duffy, had purchased pikes and arms, threw a great portion of them into the Liffey. But let their Lordships take a longer term; let them take the 20 years during which that Act, not a very severe one, was what the Lord Lieutenant had to depend upon for the protection of life and property in Ireland. If they compared the number of agrarian outrages for the first 10 years with the number for the last 10 years of that period they would find that they were reduced more than half. Therefore, with respect to the historical argument of the Prime Minister that for 50 years the Acts had failed, for 20 years of that time they had produced the result they were intended to produce. But neither the precedents of former times nor the argument from history on this question ought to decide the matter. He held that it was the bounden duty of the Government if they believed that Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland were not adequately protected from intimidation to propose such meaasures as would protect them. Lord Grey had said—"Liberty is based upon public order. If public order is destroyed, liberty cannot exist." He hoped before the discussion terminated they should have a distinct expression of opinion from Her Majesty's Government, on whom the responsibility rested, that they considered Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland were sufficiently protected, and that that was the reason why they had not introduced such provisions for their protection as Her Majesty's subjects had a right to expect.

LORD ASHBURNE said, no doubt it was the reason which the noble Earl who had just spoken had given which prevented him from taking his seat on the opposite Bench. The noble Earl had presented considerations which must have carried conviction to every one of their Lordships. For his own part, he should be astounded if any Member of Her Majesty's Government could indicate one single flaw in the noble Earl's statements of facts, or challenge one of the inferences which he had deduced. This Bill had been presented at a time when it was absolutely impossible for their Lordships to make a single Amendment in it; because the noble Earl who had introduced it was to ask for the suspension of the Standing Orders, so that every stage of the measure might be taken to-night. Their Lordships, therefore, could but indicate their opinion of the Bill, and of the way in which it ought to be carried out, if there was to be protection for life and property in Ireland. There was no excuse for the neglect of Her Majesty's Government. Over and over again they had been asked whether it was their intention to re-introduce the measure, and replies were given which did not indicate any clear intention. It was not until the House of Commons was engaged in considering what was called a Government of Ireland Bill, when, to a casual observer, it appeared that there was to be a prolonged agony of procrastination, that this Bill was presented at all. A strange commentary on what was going on in the other House was to be found in the cautious and moderate speech of the noble Earl who moved the second reading, who presented the Bill, to use his own words, as a Bill "to increase the safety of life in Ireland," as a Bill that was "necessary to protect life and property in Ireland;"

as a Bill essential "to check men of rebellious views;" as a Bill essential "to check the perpetration of outrages by those who would otherwise avail themselves of their power to commit them;" and, finally, as a measure to check those "who might be labouring under a not unnatural excitement" in the present interesting period. These were grave words to use at the present time. It was a strange thing when it was proposed to hand over the government of Ireland to those who had not shown themselves to be advocates of social order that this Bill should have been presented in the terms used by the noble Earl. This was a measure of vital social importance; a Bill that professed to diminish the crime of murder and to increase the safety of life and property. When presented formerly by Sir William Harcourt, then Home Secretary, he stated that it was a Bill for peace preservation in Ireland. It was part of what had been improperly called a Coercion Code. If men kept their hands from the commission of crime and outrage, they would not come under the operation of those Acts? Was he to be told, then, that this Act was to be called by any other name than that by which the Legislature called it—a measure for the prevention of crime and outrage? He was as much an opponent of coercion as anybody; but he must know what coercion meant. He was against coercion that prevented the landlord from exercising his fair and plain rights reasonably, honestly, and justly; he was against coercion that prevented tenants realizing the profits that came honestly from their own hard labour; that prevented those who went to fairs from doing their business without terror to their lives; that stepped into every relation of life, and made it uncertain whether men who rose in the morning, living honestly and working fairly and justly, would be able to lie down in their beds at night safe and peaceable. He ventured to think that not one solitary syllable of qualification of the words he had ventured to use could be uttered by noble Lords opposite. When the Government originally introduced this Bill, thinking it necessary, he supposed, for the great purpose specified by the noble Earl—the protection of life and property in Ireland—they came to the conclusion that it was necessary that it should continue for two years. Two years was not a very long period, but it was long enough to prevent their being called upon in the next Session of Parliament to consider this question and the products of this Bill. If the Bill was originally necessary for two years, why did the Government accept an Amendment limiting the operation of the Bill to the 31st of December of next year? The responsibility for that was with the Government. They presented this Bill on their own responsibility as a Bill they believed to be absolutely necessary now for the government of Ireland. They originally thought it would be required for two years, and they had not lessened their responsibility because at the bidding of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment in the other House they had cut down that two years. The noble Earl opposite had asked a question, which he supposed would receive an answer from some occupant of the Treasury Bench—namely, were the Government satisfied with their present powers? That question had been asked more than once in the course of the present Session. They were told originally to wait till the 1st of April, and shortly after that they were told that a great panacea would be found. That panacea was all but dead. If it was not dead it was upon its death-bed; and if they could not look to that ill-starred measure to supply what was to be a new source of social order in Ireland, the noble Earl was right in now again pressing the question upon Her Majesty's Government of how did they now think that they would be able to maintain social order in Ireland? This Bill must, of course, be to some extent their answer; but still the noble Earl was entitled to press his question. The noble Earl who introduced the Bill gave some statistics. At a period of his life he had had the honour to be one of the secretaries of the Statistical Society of Ireland. He looked back upon that with satisfaction, for though it had given him some respect for statistics, it had made him utterly fearless when they were quoted against him. The noble Earl had contrasted the first four months of 1886 with the first four months of 1881; in other words, he made a contrast with the worst possible year he could find for the last 10 years. That was a circumstance that was certainly to be borne in mind.

nations to grow wider and wider, and difficulties to arise greater, perhaps, than those which existed at the time of the Union. It is in that sense that the Government consider that this disastrous policy of repression has failed. My noble Friend has mentioned the proceedings of Lord John Russell when, at the head of the Opposition, he turned out the Government of Sir Robert Peel upon an Arms Act, and subsequently himself introduced a measure of the same kind. That incident really presents one of the strongest proofs of the dangers and difficulties of a policy of intermittent coercion. It taught the historical lesson that such are the exigencies of Party in this country that there is no possibility of a steady policy of coercion being pursued towards Ireland. In 1846 the Protectionist Party, for ends which had no connection with Irish policy, and looking only to their own interests, joined with the Liberal Party to oust Sir Robert Peel, and they upset him for reasons which had nothing to do with Ireland, whose interests were sacrificed to the demands of Party in this country. Then followed the usual retribution, and the successful Party had to bring in a measure like that which they had defeated for the purpose of overthrowing Sir Robert Peel. In 1880 the Conservative Government, when about to leave Office, acting, I am afraid, just as any other Party in this country would have acted, declined to renew the Peace Preservation Act, and why? Because it was inconvenient to renew it. Then came the Government of which I was a Member, and they found that the introduction of a measure to supply the want left by their Predecessors would be disagreeable to their own Party, and would be opposed in a manner which would put a stop to all other Parliamentary Business. Very soon, however, we found that, as usual, the state of Ireland was becoming worse, and we were compelled to have recourse to measures of repression. Precisely the same thing has happened in the last 12 months. The Government of Mr. Gladstone was overthrown when about to introduce some repressive legislation. The noble Marquess came into Office in circumstances of difficulty, I admit; but I cannot help thinking that some Members of his Government must have felt considerable misgiving about the course which he pursued. Many of them, I feel confident, would have been glad of some renewal of the Crimes Act; but a General Election was impending, and the whole circumstances of the case were such that the Government of the noble Marquess, to the great injury of Ireland and to the great danger of the peace of that country, suffered the Act to lapse. I say it does not matter which Party has to deal with these questions. It is not the want of political morality and honour in this or that Party, but it is the circumstances of the case which invariably lead one Party after another to pursue the same course. I say, then, that the coercion policy has failed. The noble Marquess said the other day that to give any policy of that kind fair play it must be pursued continuously and with perseverance for 20 years.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said nothing whatever about coercion. I said 20 years of wise and resolute government would place Ireland in a satisfactory position. I may have said resolute and continuous policy.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I accept that description; but that is precisely the kind of government that has been lacking in Ireland. You have only had since the Union a Government resolute from time to time by fits and starts; irresolute at other times. That state of things is one of the main reasons why I think that the time has come when it is absolutely necessary that we should abandon a policy which I believe to be disastrous, and that we should try the experiment which Mr. Gladstone has put forward. I do not feel justified in discussing a Bill which is now before the other House; but this I will say—I feel sure that the policy spoken of by the noble and learned Lord is a policy which is far more dead than the Bill to which he referred, and that whatever may be the fate of that Bill now there is sufficient life in the policy which it embodies to warrant our hoping that eventually it will become law.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: The noble Earl who has just addressed your Lordships used an argument which would have had great weight if he had been impeaching the consistency and political morality of various Governments, his own included. I agree with the noble

Earl as to the low order of the political morality of those who combined in 1847 for objects which had nothing to do with Ireland to prevent the renewal of the powers that were thought necessary for the government of that country. I will say nothing about the morality, although I might say something about the courage, of the Government who quitted Office in 1880, and who left their Successors to renew the powers which were deemed to be essential for the preservation of peace in Ireland. I will not deny that the Government which succeeded, of which I was a Member, thought itself justified in not then renewing the special legislation for Ireland, and in waiting to see whether Ireland could be governed without special powers; but when we found that we required additional powers we asked Parliament for them and obtained them. I must admit that I think an unfortunate time was taken to displace the Government that was in power last year, for the effect was to prevent Parliament being asked to renew those powers which the Government thought necessary; and, as a consequence, the noble Marquess opposite found himself in exactly the same position as the Liberal Administration in 1880. The noble Marquess apparently determined to try the experiment of governing without special powers, rather than encounter those difficulties which undoubtedly he might have met with if he had taken the braver and more courageous course. But I cannot see, because the noble Marquess tried the same experiment last year that we tried in 1880, and with the same result that he also failed, why that should make necessary a total reversal of the course of legislation and the abandonment of measures which have been deemed requisite for the preservation of peace and life and liberty and property in Ireland for so many years. That is what I cannot understand. I demur to the word "policy" as used by the noble Earl below. It is not a policy. It is the discharge of the most absolute and most indispensable duty of a Government, and one the abdication of which I should not like to describe by the word that would most aptly suit it. It may be right or wrong to repeal the Union; it may be right or it may be wrong to give up the government to those who have hitherto set all law at defiance, and made government in Ireland so difficult; but that has nothing to do with the question whether life and liberty and property ought to be protected. Those who, sitting in the places of Government, apply the term "coercive policy" to the discharge of the first duties of government are not fit for the position they hold. It is not coercion to do what is needful to prevent illegal coercion. It is not coercion to prevent one set of men absolutely tyrannizing over another. What is this present Bill? We have persons saying that we must abandon for ever a policy which they call a policy of coercion, and yet they introduce this Bill—a very proper Bill, though it may not be all that is necessary. They know that legislation of this kind is necessary, and yet they denounce the noble Marquess opposite for making speeches in which he says—"I do not want coercion. I want to interfere as little as possible with the liberty of any man in Ireland or anywhere else; but I do think it necessary for the Government to do what it can to repress crime, and, if fresh powers are wanting, to ask Parliament for powers for the repression of crime." Those who talk in this way about abandoning a policy of repressive legislation do not seem to me to speak as if they really knew what they are talking about.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I listened with great curiosity to the speech of my noble Friend below. He pointed out that by the play of Parties, without attaching exclusive blame to any one of them, Ireland had been grossly misgoverned; but he failed to point out that for what he called the policy of coercion he has any substitute whatever. I do not mean to suggest that he should have indicated arguments in favour of another measure under consideration in the other House; but from the beginning to the end of his speech there was not one word of hope held out that life and liberty and property would in future be assured to the people of Ireland. I listened also to the speech of the noble Lord who introduced this Bill, from which it appears that he is inviting the House to take part in what is little better than a farce. He told us that any law for the prohibition of the possession of arms was almost useless for the prevention of murders. A man who wishes to commit a murder can always procure and hide a revolver. This Bill might be of use to prevent insurrection;

but it would not prevent the tyranny now exercised over the people of Ireland by means of secret organizations and their agents who threaten the officials of the Land Courts. My noble Friend quoted statistics to show that at the present moment there was no great amount of agrarian crime. But I have heard Minister after Minister quote statistics of Irish crime, and I always found that these always showed just what was wanted. The figures are of no use for proving the conclusion aimed at by my noble Friend. The very absence of agrarian crimes is proof of the completeness of the power of the National League. This power was evidenced a few days ago in the Dublin Bankruptcy Court, where it appeared, to use the words of Judge Boyd—

"That the Secretary of the National League had the audacity to write to the auctioneer of the Court threatening him that if he attempted to let certain land that the Court had ordered to be let his life would probably be in danger."

We must have come to a pretty pass, indeed, when such a thing as this can occur; and the Government to meet this state of things propose a Bill which is to last 12 months, and which my noble Friend admits is perfectly useless for the purpose of preventing outrage. I heard him condemn the policy of the noble Marquess in allowing the Crimes Act to expire. What has changed the views of my hon. Friend? Is it the return of 85 Nationalist Members to Parliament, and the necessity of catering for their votes? We are invited to take a leap in the dark, of the result of which it is impossible to judge. I confess that I have no belief in a Government of Ireland set up in Ireland not with the consent of the whole people, but with the consent only of a majority made up of some of the elements which are now coercing the people of Ireland. Instead of blaming the noble Marquess for recommending 20 years of steady, resolute government, I say that steady, resolute government in Ireland ought to last not for 20 years, but for ever. I say we should have a Government which will protect liberty, life, and property permanently in Ireland; and until that is secured, by some means or other, we shall have a repetition or a continuance of those miserable rivalries of Parties which lead to the best interests of the Irish people being sacrificed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSHELL): My Lords, there are certain matters on which I think all your Lordships will be agreed. There are none of us who will not desire that individual liberty should be protected and the respect of individual rights preserved. But, my Lords, I quite agree, to some extent, with what has been said about the use of the words "coercion" and "coercive legislation." I agree that it may be necessary at times that you should create an exceptional state of the law to meet an exceptional state of crime; but I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion whenever you are compelled to create an exception from that which you believe to be ordinarily the best, the most just, and the wisest law you are driven to a necessity which is an evil one, which is one only to be adopted after it cannot be possibly avoided. I admit that there are occasions on which it cannot be avoided; but I say the thing is evil in itself, and by whatever name you call it, there is a feeling that the legislation is exceptional, and that you are applying to one part of the Kingdom a law which you do not apply to the other portions. I have heard it said—"Why not apply to the whole of the United Kingdom the laws which are found necessary for Ireland?" My answer to that question is that you cannot. It would be utterly impossible for any Government in this country to propose, with the hope of meeting with the sanction of the people, to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom the laws which you apply to the Irish people. Therefore, while I do not deny that exceptional legislation may be necessary—it is admitted by the introduction of this measure—that legislation is mischievous in its results and to be avoided if possible. I think, too, that when you are driven to exceptional legislation the stronger and the more repressive you make it the more bitter is the feeling which you create against your legislation and against your administration. Exceptional legislation of this kind is an evil, because it creates, not friendship to and sympathy with the law, but hostility to it; and however great and well devised your repressive measures may be they will always have an element of failure about them. The result is to create a sympathy among the people with crime and criminals instead of a sympathy with the law and with those who administer it. That is the difficulty we have to deal with in the repressive legislation with regard to Ireland. Can your Lordships regard with satisfaction the result of this legislation and its action on Ireland for the last half-century? During this period the people have had less sympathy with the law and with those who administer it, less hostility to the criminal, and less desire to assist in discovering him. Is this a result which can possibly be regarded with satisfaction, or can it be regarded otherwise than with a feeling of the deepest regret and dismay? I do not understand my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India in the slightest degree to represent that a coercive policy had not, to some extent, at different times diminished the crime of the country. But it has never done more than diminish it. Some noble Lords have spoken as though these Acts had put an end to crime. Pass the most repressive measures you can devise to-morrow and you cannot put an end to crime in Ireland. You never have done so hitherto, and I do not believe you can. Anyone who doubts this should read the account given in this House of the condition of many parts of Ireland at the beginning of 1880, when the Peace Preservation Act was in force, and when it was administered by a resolute Government for six years, and by a Government which seemed likely to continue in Office for many years. Noble Lords will see from that debate that even with such Acts in force you cannot prevent outrage in Ireland. My noble Friend has said that it is inconsistent on the part of the Government to introduce such a measure when Ireland is not in a peaceful condition. What is the great cause of the want of peace in Ireland at the present time? Does it not consist in hostility to those who administer the law because the people have a hostility to the law itself? It is no use shutting our eyes to the fact. We may lament and deplore it, but it is only fooling ourselves if we should shut our eyes to the fact that the great majority of the people of Ireland hate the Parliamentary Union between the two countries, which enables, as they believe, a Parliament which is not in full sympathy with them to make laws for them. They believe that the laws could be made better for them if they had the power of making the laws for themselves. This feeling has shown itself many times. It has never ceased to be manifested, and it is one of the difficulties to be dealt with in Ireland. Is it inconsistent if there are those who think that it would be possible to bring about a state of things in which that sympathy with law and with the administrators of the law should exist, because that law is their own, and that they would feel sympathy with those who administered the law when it did not come to many of them in an alien garb? I submit that there is no inconsistency in that view. While it does not absolve us from the necessity of asking for such powers as are contained in this Bill, we ought not to be prevented from trying to bring about a better state of things. Surely it is a desirable end to gain if the people of Ireland can be brought to love the connection of Ireland with this country and to have a sympathy with the administration of the law. That, surely, is a great gain, and I do not wish to enter into the question how this end is sought to be attained by another measure of the Government. Her Majesty's Government are consistent in doing two things that are incumbent upon them. One is to ask for exceptional legislation in the direction in which they believe exceptional legislation necessary, and the other is to endeavour to get to the root of the evil and to bring about such a state of things as will render this legislation unnecessary in the future. It is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that no measure of exceptional legislation introduced was carried through Parliament without first of all intensely embittering the relations of this country with the people of Ireland. If the Government hoped that it would be possible to introduce a measure which would put matters on a better footing in Ireland, surely it would be nothing short of madness on their part as a prelude to the introduction of that measure to introduce legislation which could not be passed in a week or a month, but which would intensify the feeling of hostility to this country by large masses in the Sister Isle. That was a consideration which should not be lost sight of; and I think such a course would be in the highest degree unwise. The noble Earl has referred to the course which the Government took in 1880, and the course taken by the noble Marquess recently. I cannot admit that the two cases are at all parallel. The noble Earl who dissolved Parliament in 1880 chose his own time for the Dissolution. It was his act that dissolved the Parliament, and he did it within about a couple of months fixed for the date when the Peace Preservation Act was to expire. When the Government came in in 1880 it was absolutely impossible to renew the Peace Preservation Act before it expired; but the state of things in the spring of 1881 was absolutely different from what it was in 1880—in degree, in intensity, and in extent. During the three months after the expiration of the Act in 1880 there was no increase of crime; the increase came later than that, not from the expiring of the Peace Preservation Act at all, but from a state of things which had previously existed in a part of Ireland, and which spread by agitation from the West to the East, until it found its way over a great part of Ireland. During the three or four months following the expiration of the Act there was no increase of crime; but in the following autumn and winter there was an enormous increase. How stands the matter now? Are the two cases parallel? Lord Beaconsfield chose his own time for a Dissolution; Mr. Gladstone did not choose his own time. It is said the noble Marquess, at the beginning of this year, did just what the late Government did in 1881; he trusted to the future introduction of a measure. I should like to know what was the change in the state of things between the time when the noble Marquess came in last summer and the beginning of this year—between the time when the speeches were made last autumn with the view of showing that it was unnecessary to renew the Act and the beginning of this year? The records will show that there was no substantial change, and there is none now. Therefore, I have shown that the two cases are not parallel. I admit to the full it is the duty of those who have the reins of Government at any time to do their best to introduce such measures as will secure due regard to law in all parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. Unfortunately, to secure that completely is impossible for any Government. To secure that for Ireland has never been achieved by any Crimes Act. I venture to think that they may ultimately be found the wiser who have tried, while not failing to introduce exceptional measures, to see if they could not go deeper into the matter and remove the causes which not only intensify existing bitterness, but produce hostility to the law instead of respect for it, and sympathy with the criminal instead of the desire to bring him to justice; so that those who administer the law may come to be regarded, not as the enemies of the people, but as their friends and protectors.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: The noble and learned Lord has made, as head of the law, the extraordinary statement that the people of Ireland hate the ordinary law quite as much as the exceptional law; and if we are not to pass exceptional laws, because they will not put down crime, it would seem to follow that we are not to make any attempt to put down crime at all, but are to allow larcenies and burglaries to go on unchecked, for no legislation has achieved that result completely. The value and necessity of exceptional law depends upon what it is, and whether it is addressed to exceptional crime. I am quite willing to take my share of censure, which I think is not much deserved, for not attempting to renew part of the Peace Preservation Act in 1885. I believe that it would have been simply impossible to do it in the circumstances, with a Dissolution pending. The time that would have been occupied in the House of Commons would have delayed legislation until it would have been impracticable. In condemning the late Government at the beginning of this Session, the noble Earl opposite, addressing my noble and learned Friend (Lord Ashbourne), said—"Can the Lord Chancellor now rely upon a jury in Ireland convicting a man of agrarian crime?" Has there since then been this great change of which the noble and learned Lord has spoken? Has "Boycotting" gone down? Has intimidation ceased? I should like to know on what the noble and learned Lord founded his statement that the condition of things is the same as it was last year? What was supposed to be the glory of the noble Earl's (Earl Spencer's) administration? It was that he had kept down crime and kept Ireland in a state of order. I have admitted that the noble Earl exercised his power vigilantly, honestly, and fairly. But the question now put is, What is he prepared to do to meet the existing state of things in Ireland? The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has evaded that question altogether. He has given us an essay on exceptional legislation and the evils it does, and at the same time has admitted by the Arms Bill now under discussion that Ireland is disturbed, and needs more than ordinary legislation. Does this Arms Bill meet "Boycotting," the maiming of cattle, and the outrages promoted by the League? The provisions of law that it has been suggested should be re-enacted are not exceptional; they exist in England and Scotland. In Scotland you may institute a judicial inquiry into an offence committed without having the culprit before you; and this provision was adopted for England under the Criminal Law Amendment Bill introduced with general assent. Here, too, we can change the venue, which is one of the most important powers that ought to be enforced in Ireland. Are we to be told we make the Irish people hostile by imposing upon them a yoke we bear ourselves? Are men to be allowed to adopt unlawful means to prevent the sale of cattle and the sending of them to market? The Government are challenged to say what they will do to protect life and property in Ireland, which they know to be deeply and injuriously affected by a criminal conspiracy which exists there. I ask the noble Earl what is he going to do? Can he say that law is enforced? Can the people say that the law is properly administered? It is no answer to say that the people are to have a new Government, which will increase their respect for the law. You have to do with the present; you are neglecting the present. The people are suffering tortures; they are losing property through your neglect. Those tenants who are honest men are afraid to pay their rent through your neglect, and the landlords are impoverished. We read in the newspapers the other day that the ladies of Ireland, many of them, are reduced to destitution, because you will not put the law into force. I see the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) laughs. He probably thinks it a good laughing matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I beg the noble Viscount's pardon. I was laughing at an entirely different matter.

Viscount Cranbrook

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I apologize to the noble Earl, but I feel strongly upon this question. It is a question on which we are bound to exercise our jurisdiction as far as we can for the protection of the loyal people who are attached to this country. We are bound, as men of honour and as men interested in the whole United Kingdom, to do all we can in order to vindicate their rights. The responsibility in this matter, it is said, rested upon us at the end of the last Session, and the noble and learned Lord has reproached us because for a long period the Peace Preservation Act was not renewed. The noble and learned Lord knows that after Parliament was up it was impossible to renew that Act; and as to the former period, when the Government went out in 1880 a Bill was already prepared and was left by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowther) in the Irish Office ready for introduction. My right hon. Friend was ready to introduce that Bill if we had had a Parliamentary majority. We did not get a majority; but the Bill was ready for introduction. Again, at the beginning of this Session we announced our intention to take steps to deal with that state of things which made the law in Ireland a mockery, and which made illegality the rule as against the law. We were prepared to deal with the National League. If you are not prepared to deal with the League, at least let those laws which are in force be brought into operation by means which you can use without interfering with the liberty of a single human being. It will only be the criminal who throws himself against the law who will experience anything like coercion. I call upon you as the Government to say, first of all, can you deny the statement made by the noble Earl that Ireland is in this condition, that anarchy prevails; and then say how you can sit in your places when the Arms Act will not meet the case and not tell us what are your intentions in the future?

EARL SPENCER: It is my duty to make some observations in reply to some remarks that have been made. We have been told that we have used this word "coercion" in an improper way. I confess that I have used it in speeches which I have made, but not in any way such has been described this evening. I have used it, perhaps, as a convenient and short word, and the expression, as has been said, has become a nickname. I, for one, most firmly agree with most of the remarks made upon this subject. I do not admit for a moment that, in all times and in all places, coercion is impossible. I say that at times it will be necessary to bring in exceptional measures when the law of the land cannot be enforced. I have always held that language, and shall hold it again. I cannot agree with the noble Lord opposite, nor can I follow my noble and learned Friend behind me the Earl of Selborne, for whom I have the highest possible respect, and with whom I acted with great pleasure when we were Colleagues in the Government; but I do feel very earnestly upon this subject. I have not altered one jot or tittle of anything that I have said or felt on the subject of law and order. I feel that the maintenance of law and order is essential to the well-being of the country, and that it is the duty of the Government to try and establish law and order. No one has ever said that exceptional legislation has been ineffectual. I have repeatedly said that on nearly every occasion it has succeeded for the moment. I feel strongly, having had a long and bitter experience in Ireland, that we have put down crime from time to time effectually. But I also feel that you have never been able to succeed in winning the confidence of the Irish people to law and order; and until you succeed in that you are not gaining ground, but losing it, in Ireland. It is for that reason, and after very considerable hesitation and doubt, and with the firm conviction that I was right, that I came to the conclusion that we must leave the old paths in which we have travelled in Ireland, because when exceptional legislation terminates we are always left in a worse position than before. The word "momentous" has been used with regard to the action of the late Government. I feel that it was a momentous position which they took up, for it brought conclusively to my mind that the old policy was not continuous in Ireland, and that without continuity of policy we could not expect to do any good for the Irish people. I do not want to refer to the old subject of one Government and another having pursued one policy at one time and adopted another policy at another time. We have had too much of that. I think that the Government of the noble Marquess opposite took upon itself a grave responsibility when it did not renew certain portions of the Act. At the same time, I think he would have been perfectly justified in the course he took if he had had a new policy to recommend for Ireland. When I spoke at the beginning of the Session in the debate to which reference has been made I asked Questions on the subject, and I felt sure at the time that if the Government had no new policy they were embarking on a very dangerous course in not taking some special means to restore law and order. I quite admit what my noble Friend behind me has said, that there is still intimidation in Ireland. I lament it and deplore it. But I do not think that at this present moment there is a sufficient amount of active crime in the country to necessitate special legislation. We are now making an honest endeavour to get at the root of the evil, instead of dealing with those things which are the consequences of the ill-feeling which prevails. It is because I acknowledge the existence of social disorder that I think it is imperative to try and enter upon some new course which will have a permanent and real effect upon the state of feeling in Ireland. I thought it right to make these few observations; and I hope your Lordships will now consent to the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill."—Earl Spencer.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he must protest against the manner in which the Bill had been delayed in its introduction into the House and was now pressed forward with unseemly haste—obliging their Lordships, for the sake of the Public Service, to give up the opportunity of discussing even the principles of the Bill more than very briefly, and its details altogether. That course was calculated to place their Lordships in a very invidious aspect before the country, as always eager at the shortest notice and without discussion to pass any Bill of a coercive character. Judging from the past, he could not believe that was accidental. On the contrary, he feared it was intentional on the part of the Prime Minister, and resulted from feelings long cherished and from time to time expressed by him about their Lordships' House. He did not doubt the sincerity of the Colonial Secretary's repeated declarations of his zeal for the honour of the House, and attributed what had happened before and now to the infinitesimal influence exercised by him and his noble Colleagues over their despotic Chief. He did not wonder at the Government's having arranged that there should be only one discussion in connection with the Bill, and that a very short one, considering how miserable a figure they had presented in the debate just closed. He considered this part of a systematic policy on the part of the Prime Minister to discredit their Lordships' House as much as possible, and to hold it up to odium in the country.

Motion negatived: Then Standing Order No. XXXV. considered (according to order), and dispensed with: Bill read 3<sup>d</sup>, and passed.

CROFTERS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

(NO. 134.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that he could not allow that Motion to be put without a protest. At that late hour he did not feel justified in occupying too much of their Lordships' time in discussing this question; but as he had been taught in "another place" that it was better to express an opinion distinctly and consistently, he had ventured to put down the Notice standing in his name for the rejection of the Bill. He had no hope that he should be supported in carrying his Motion to a successful issue; but it was the most emphatic way he had of giving expression to the strong feelings he held in regard to legislation of this sort. Both in their Lordships' House and in "another place," when legislation of this kind had been proposed, he had always resisted it to the best of his power. In 1870 he resisted the Land Bill, and from that date onwards he had resisted all such legislation, and the Agricultural Holdings Act, and he resisted them because he considered it was a wrong and a vicious principle to introduce into Acts of Parliament, and would fail in the object they had in view. Their Lordships had had a discussion that evening on the state of Ireland, and Her Majesty's Government had been reproached for allowing a state of things to grow up which necessitated remedial measures, and had been challenged to say what steps they intended to take in order to secure life and property in that country. But here was a Bill—the Scottish Crofters Bill—which was neither more nor less than a piece of Irish Land Bill legislation in another form, and, he ventured to think, in the worst form. It left out one of the three F's, because he supposed the crofters had not enough money wherewith to buy their holdings. The Bill, he considered, was a more mischievous Bill than the Irish Act at present on the Statute Book, and was a rapid and considerable advance on the Irish legislation, because it contained two new clauses in regard to land legislation. One of these was the principle of compulsory leasing, and the other had reference to arrears of rent, the clause providing that the Land Court should decide what was to be paid by a tenant and the time when they were to be paid, and there was nothing of the kind in the Irish Act.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Earl of Dalhousie): There is the Arrears Act, though.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that was another question; but here was a concentrated measure by which the Government established a Land Court, which was to have the power of deciding what a debtor should pay. He protested against any such proposal, and therefore felt bound to raise his voice against it; but, as he said before, at that late hour he would not do more than enter his protest against this sort of legislation, which he considered impolitic and mischievous, and in order that his protest might be recorded he would move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion?

Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

On Question, That the Bill do pass?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS begged to move an Amendment to the effect that the rent fixed by the Land Court should be collected by a Revenue officer. He thought that as the Government had taken his property out of the landlord's possession they ought to collect the rent.

Amendment moved,

At end of Clause 6 add—"d.) The rent fixed by the Land Commission shall be collected and paid over to the landlord by the officers of the Inland Revenue free of all charge for such collection."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons; and to be printed as amended. (No. 139.)

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE PROTECTION.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD asked the Lord President of the Council, How many Judges and other high officials of the Civil Service in Ireland were now, or had lately been, under special police protection?

THE LORD PRESIDENT (Earl SPENCER) said, there were still a number of Judges and officials receiving a certain amount of police protection, as they had done in the past.

QUESTIONS.

LOCAL TAXATION—THE COUNTY RATE — INCIDENCE OF PAYMENT BY TOWNS HAVING QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he will institute the inquiry recently promised into the subject of the contributions to the County Rate now paid by towns having separate Quarter Sessions?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BROADHURST) Birmingham, Bordesley (who replied) said: The question as to the best method of instituting this inquiry is at the present moment engaging the attention of the Secretary of State. He hopes in a short time to be able to make some definite arrangement.

TRADE AND COMMERCE — REPORTS AND SUGGESTIONS FROM INDIAN AND COLONIAL CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If the Chambers of Commerce throughout the Colonial Dominions of the Empire have been informed of the desire expressed by the Imperial Foreign Office to receive suggestions, from bodies and persons interested in British trade, as to the manner in which the services of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Officers could be turned to the best advantage for its promotion and extension?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) (Dorsetshire, E.): The Colonial Office does not communicate directly with the Chambers of Commerce in the Colonial Dominions of the Empire; but we propose calling the attention of the Governments of the Colonies in which there are such Bodies to the question raised by the hon. Member, and they will, no doubt, put themselves in communication with their own Chambers of Commerce, and report to Her Majesty's Government any recommendations received from them on the subject.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Chambers of Commerce in the Indian Empire have been informed of the desire expressed by the Imperial Foreign Office to receive suggestions, from bodies and persons interested in British trade, as to the manner in which the services of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Officers could be turned to the best advantage for its promotion and extension?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STAFFORD HOWARD) (Gloucester, Thornbury): The Chambers of Commerce in India have not yet been communicated with in reference to this matter; but the Government of India will be requested to invite an expression of the views of the Chambers and of other Commercial Bodies on the subject.

REPUBLIC OF HAYTI—IMPRISONMENT OF A BRITISH SUBJECT.

MR. F. W. MACLEAN (Oxford, Woodstock) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the case of one F. B. Coles, a British subject resident in the Republic of Hayti, and now undergoing a sentence of three years' imprisonment at Port au Prince; whether a representation has been made to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs by a number of British subjects in Hayti to the effect that the said F. B. Coles is innocent of the offence with which he was charged, and that he did not obtain a fair and impartial trial in the Criminal Court at Port au Prince; whether, notwithstanding the intervention and protests of Her Majesty's Consul at Port au Prince, the authorities of the said Republic refuse to take any action in the matter, either in the way of releasing the said F. B. Coles or otherwise; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, if satisfied of the innocence of the said F. B. Coles, will demand, at the hands of the authorities of Hayti, his immediate release, and redress for the wrong to which, it is alleged, he has been subjected?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BAYCE) (Aberdeen, S.): I must refer my hon. and learned Friend to the reply I gave yesterday—Monday—to a Question on this subject by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hampstead (Sir Henry Holland), and in which I stated that Her Majesty's Government, believing that justice had not been done in the case of Mr. Coles, were about to despatch a Commissioner to Hayti to call the serious attention of the Haytian Government to the case of Coles, as well as to the complaints and representations received from British subjects on this and other acts of oppression and denial of justice.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF A PETTY SESSIONS CLERK, CO. CAVAN.

MR. A. BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the election of a Petty Sessions clerk for the district of Virginia, county Cavan, the voting will be confined to the magistrates of the district, or be open to the magistrates of the county?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne), in reply, said, only those magistrates who resided within the district to be served by the clerk, and those who were in the habit of attending the Petty Sessions were entitled to vote in the election.

THE ENSILAGE COMMISSION—THE EXPENSES.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS (Southwark, Bermondsey) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that the Lords of the Treasury have refused to incur the cost of collecting evidence by the Ensilage Commission, which evidence has been printed and circulated among Members by order of the House?

Mr. Howard Vincent

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.): The inquiry of the private Ensilage Commission, of which Lord Walsingham was Chairman, was not an official investigation; and the Treasury, therefore, did not feel justified in contributing to its cost.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE RATHFRILAND POLICE.

Mr. SMALL (Down, S., asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, for some time since until lately, it has invariably been arranged that either the district inspector or the head constable stationed at Rathfriland, county Down, should be a Catholic; whether, very recently, this arrangement has been departed from, and both these officers are now Protestants; whether Head Constable Smith attends "Loyal Minority" meetings as a partisan, although not required to attend when on duty; whether Rathfriland is a town in which party spirit runs high; and, whether, under those circumstances, it is intended to continue the present system, or revert to the former one, which worked so satisfactorily?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): For some years until quite recently the District Inspector and the Head Constable in the Rathfriland district have been of different creeds. At present they are both Protestants—one an Episcopalian and the other a Presbyterian. The Inspector General is of opinion that the work will be impartially performed under the existing arrangement; and if he sees any necessity for doing so he will at once alter the arrangement. The Head Constable attended the meeting referred to in the Question; but he did so on duty, and under instructions. I believe that Party spirit runs pretty high in that district.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—SALARIES

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W., asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is contemplated to raise the salaries of the Chief Secretary of Excise, the Controller of Stamps and Stores, and the Chief Inspector of Stamps and Taxes by the sum of £200 per annum a-piece, although each of these officers is already in receipt of a salary of £1,000 or upwards; and, whether he will give an assurance that, before these salaries are increased, he will lay upon the Table of the House Papers containing the reasons of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for recommending such increase?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.): The increase of salaries referred to by the hon. Member is not contemplated.

THE ADMIRALTY—PAY OF COAST-GUARDSMEN.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Kent, Isle of Thanet) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether coastguardsmen who, if they had remained in the active service of the Fleet, would be entitled to twopence extra per diem, receive that extra sum when they are called upon to go on active service; and, if this is not the case, what reason there is why these men should receive less daily pay than their shipmates; and, whether steps will be taken to remedy this injustice?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. HIBBERT) (Oldham: In reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I can only say that it is not considered there is any sufficient reason for granting the additional 2d. per day to Coastguardsmen when called out for the short summer cruise. It is well understood that one of the conditions of service in the Coastguard is that men will have to keep up their seafaring qualities by short cruises of this kind. If Coastguardsmen are called out for active service in case of emergency they would be entitled to the re-engaged pay; but in that case their service would be beyond the conditions of a summer cruise. It is to be remembered that while they are afloat their wives and families are still inhabiting free quarters at home, which is not the case with the men with whom a comparison is sought to be established. I may add that the Coastguard Service is very popular, so much so that it has been found necessary to make the qualifications for appointment more stringent.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SEIZURES FOR RENT IN KERRY

Mr. SHEEHAN (Kerry, E., asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that, on the 22nd April, in the division of Coom and Headford, county Kerry, two parties of police under command of two head constables accompanied the sheriff on eviction duty and for seizure for rent; whether a policeman named Mahony assaulted a woman with his rifle, and kicked and otherwise ill-treated her while down; and, if a man in the employment of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, whose only offence was keeping his cattle aside, got knocked down and had to get medical aid for ten days; whether Mahony is a native of Knocknagree, county Cork, adjacent to district in which seizures were made; and, if so, whether his removal to a more distant district would not be in accordance with the spirit of the police rules: and, if, in the interest of justice (twenty-two persons being injured), an independent inquiry should be held into the circumstances, there being no responsible officer in charge of about twenty policemen, who acted on that occasion without orders?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): On the date in question a force of 26 police, in charge of a Head Constable, was engaged in protecting sheriffs' bailiffs who made seizures for rent. There was considerable excitement, and an attempt was made to rescue the seizures. It is not the case that Constable Mahony assaulted a woman with his rifle. The constable was not armed with a rifle, and the police are not aware that any woman was assaulted on the occasion. A man who is not in the employment of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, but who happened to be planting potatoes for one of their stationmasters that day, joined the mob, and received some injuries, when, eventually, the police were obliged to charge, for which he has since been under medical treatment. Constable Mahony is a native of Knocknagree, county Cork, which is near the district where the seizures were made; but he belongs to the County Kerry Force, and there is nothing in the Regulations requiring his removal to another county. As I have explained, the police were in charge of a Head Constable, an officer who ranks next to a District Inspector.

Mr. Sheehan

There do not appear to be any grounds for an inquiry.

POST OFFICE CONTRACTS—CONVEYANCE OF MAILS TO INDIA.

MR. R. T. REID (Aston Manor) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the contracts for the conveyance of mails to India have been let for a period of years; and if he can state the terms and the names of the successful contractors?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER) (Wolverhampton, E.): No decision has yet been come to upon the tenders lately sent in for the Indian Mail Service.

ADMIRALTY—NAVAL VOLUNTEERS.

SIR WHITTAKER ELLIS (Surrey, Kingston) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether their Lordships propose accepting the offer made by the Port of Great Yarmouth to raise a corps of Naval Volunteers for local defence?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. HERBERT) (Oldham): In reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that the Board of Admiralty have considered the offer of the Port of Great Yarmouth to raise a corps of Naval Volunteers for local defence, and are prepared to accept it.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS — TUNBRIDGE SCHOOL ENDOWMENTS.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether a request was presented to him, as Chairman of the Endowed Schools Committee, by the Tunbridge Local Board, on behalf of the inhabitants of that town, praying the Committee to receive evidence from gentlemen appointed on their behalf, on the subject of the decision of the Charity Commissioners with regard to the school endowments at Tunbridge; and, whether this request was refused; and, if so, upon what ground?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir LYON PLAYFAIR) (Leeds, S.): A request was received by me, as Chairman of the Endowed Schools Committee, to receive evidence from persons on behalf of the Tunbridge Local Board relating to the School Endowments at Tunbridge. The decision as to the locality of that school was made by the Charity Commissioners in the exercise of their jurisdiction under the Charitable Trusts Acts, and not under the Endowed Schools Acts, and was not within the reference to the Committee by the House. Even had this not been the case, Tunbridge School was not among the selected typical schools to which the Committee confined their inquiry as illustrations of the working of the Endowed Schools Act.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.— THE ARCHIVES OF DUBLIN CASTLE.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY (Glasgow, Blackfriars) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, if the Government of Ireland Bill becomes Law, the new Irish Government will be entitled to become the custodian of the Archives of Dublin Castle, including the inquiries into murders, outrages, treason, and other felonies during the past seven years, some of which resulted in public prosecutions and some not; and, if so, what protection the Government intends to give to those persons who, either voluntarily or involuntarily, have been concerned in such inquiries?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The subject of the records in the custody of the Irish Government is one of very considerable and obvious importance, and has not escaped our attention. An Act of Parliament dealing with the custody of Irish records was passed in 1867. We consider that, under the circumstances supposed in the Question, new legislation will be necessary; and in the preparation of the clauses aiming at that legislation the matters referred to in the Question will not be left out of sight.

WAR DEPARTMENT—REGIMENTAL BANDS AT PUBLIC FESTIVALS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has observed a statement in The Times, that the band of the Coldstream Guards played a selection of airs at a dinner given by the Grocers' Company on Saturday last to commemorate the restoration of Charles the Second, at which dinner the speeches were of an essentially party character; and, whether, in view of his statement a short time ago, that enrolled soldiers in uniform ought not to take part at party demonstrations, he will take steps to give effect to this statement?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): I do not think that any blame can attach to the officer commanding the Coldstream Guards for allowing the band of the regiment to be hired to play at this dinner. He could not be expected to detect anything political in an ordinary City feast, and the celebration of the restoration of Charles II. would appear to be entirely unconnected with the Party politics of the present day. The blame would seem rather to rest upon the after-dinner speakers, who succeeded in giving a Party character to the occasion; but my hon. Friend should remember the conditions under which their speeches were delivered. At all events, the soldiers were not responsible for what was said; and I would even express a hope that, according to usual custom, after having enlivened with their music the successive courses of the dinner, they may have been spared the necessity of listening to the toasts which followed.

GOLD AND SILVER PLATE IN THE COLONIAL EXHIBITION—CUSTOMS DUTY—DEALERS' LICENCES.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the fact of the Foreign gold and silver plate now in the Colonial Exhibition not having been charged with Customs Duty is accidental or intentional; if accidental, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to treat the Colonial Exhibition as a bonded warehouse, and to claim payment upon all goods liable to Duty prior to their delivery to purchasers; if intentional, whether it is a legal proceeding on the part of the Customs authorities, under existing legislation in regard to the trades in the precious metals; whether Her Majesty's Government will direct that all persons trading for their livelihood in gold and silver plate, outside of the Colonial Exhibition, should be placed upon an equality with those exhibiting and dealing inside the Exhibition, or else that the latter do pay the usual charge of £5 15s. for a licence; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will consider whether the time has arrived when such Duty should be finally abolished?

was in charge of the Secretary to the Treasury, and inquiries as to its fate or prospects had better be addressed to him.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]
[NINTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [10th May]. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(The Marquess of Dartington.)

Debate resumed.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the debate upon this measure, I shall endeavour, as far as possible, to avoid any barren repetition of arguments with which the House is already familiar. I hope it may not be necessary for me to occupy the time of the House at any very great length; and I must ask those hon. Members who in the course of the discussion have devoted a considerable portion of their speeches to personal references to myself to excuse me if upon this occasion, at all events, I do not reply to them. Those personal references—some of them humorous, as in the case of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and some of them very bitter—may tend to relieve the monotony of the debate; but I think they are below the level of the great Constitutional discussion in which we are called upon to take part—for, Sir, it is a great controversy in which we are now engaged. It has been admitted by the Government that their proposals are the gravest and the most startling that have been presented to Parliament during the life of the present generation. On the one hand, we have the Government honestly and sincerely believing that these proposals will bring about a final and friendly settlement of the difficulties which have existed for centuries between Ireland and Great Britain, and which have acted so injuriously to the interests of both countries alike. That is a settlement which may well evoke passionate enthusiasm, and to accomplish which effectually would be the crowning glory of an illustrious career. On the other hand, those who oppose this measure believe with equal honesty and with equal conviction that they form an irretrievable and fatal step, which will lead to animosities more dangerous than any with which we have hitherto had to deal, which will destroy the influence and power of the United Kingdom, which have been so often exerted to promote the freedom and civilization of the world, and which will postpone indefinitely measures of domestic reform and progress if the complications which we anticipate should unfortunately result from this legislation. I do not say now which of these alternative hopes and fears have the better foundation. All I ask my hon. Friends to admit is that at least the decision which we are called upon to take is one of momentous importance, and that no man can rid himself of his responsibility in this matter to form and to act upon an independent judgment altogether without reference to any personal considerations. There has been in some quarters a desire to minimize the importance of the decision which we have to take. We have been told that the Bill is dead, and almost in the words of Shakespeare we have been asked to—

"Vex not his ghost; O, let him pass! he hates him much

That would upon the rack of this tough world Stretch him out of longer."

We are advised that under these circumstances to vote for this dead Bill will be only a matter of form; and that it may be treated either as a Vote of Confidence in the Government or as a vote upon an abstract Resolution, defining and accepting the principle of the Bill, but not committing us in the slightest degree in our actions upon any other measure which may hereafter be presented. Well, Sir, I do not think that the Government—I do not believe that the Prime Minister—would accept a vote upon that understanding or upon these conditions. The Government have had two courses before them. They might, if they had seen fit, have withdrawn this Bill altogether, and they might have submitted a Resolution affirming the principle, in the language of the Prime Minister. If they had done that I should have voted for the Resolution without hesitation. But, at the same time, I have to point out that, although for the time it might have united the Party, still the result would hardly have been satisfactory. What is the principle of the Bill which we should have voted for by such a Resolution, as it has been defined by the Prime Minister? It is the establishment of a Legislative Authority in Ireland to deal with exclusively Irish affairs. Well, Sir, that is, as I have said, a principle which I could cordially accept; but it seems to me that that is very vague and indefinite, and would leave us all a very large discretion. A Resolution of that kind would be consistent, for instance, with the establishment of a Parliament like Grattan's Parliament, with a separate Exchequer, with separate Customs and Excise, and practically an independent and a co-ordinate Legislative Authority. On the other hand, it would equally, in my judgment, be consistent with the establishment of some system of National Councils, purely subordinate in their character, and with very limited and strictly defined powers of legislation. I say that a Resolution of the kind I have named would be consistent with either hypothesis; and, as I have mentioned a National Council, may I say one word in reference to the speech which was made late last night by the hon. Member for Dublin City

Mr. Dwyer Gray? I do not see him in his place; but he was on that occasion very severe on what he called my proposals for National Councils as they appeared in an article in The Irish Daily Worker, which, in the first instance, he attributed to me. Sir, the hon. Member knows a good deal about that article. He knows who wrote it, and he knows that I did not. He knows that although I committed myself unhesitatingly to the principle of National Councils, yet the details of the scheme were supplied to me from an Irish source, and the hon. Member knows well what that source was. At the time the article appeared the hon. Member wrote articles in The Freeman's Journal, which he was good enough to send to me, and in those articles he gave to those proposals a much more cordial reception than he vouchsafed to them last night. And the hon. Member, I believe, knows—and if he does not I will tell him—that I have irrefutable and incontrovertible evidence that those proposals at the time they were made received the approval and support of distinguished members of the Nationalist Party. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: O'Shea.] I have pointed out that such an abstract Resolution as has sometimes been suggested would be capable of this diverse interpretation. But the second course which the Government have before them is the course which they have actually taken. They have asked us, in the words of the Prime Minister himself, to give a vote which he has always placed in contrast to an abstract Resolution, and which must, therefore, be assumed to have more meaning than an abstract Resolution would have—to give a vote in reference to a Bill before the House, from the principle and the purpose and the main outlines of which the Government have stated that they cannot possibly depart. Well, Sir, after the meeting at the Foreign Office the other day, some of us hoped that the Bill was dead; and not only that it was dead, but that it would never be revived again in its present shape. We hoped that advantage would be taken of the interval which we expected would be given to recast and remodel this measure. We hoped that that might be done, in view of the discussion which has taken place, and with the desire which I, for my part, believe the Prime Minister sincerely has to meet the wishes of many of his supporters and the objections which they have taken. If this had been the case we might have abstained, at all events, from active opposition. We should have felt that we were absolutely uncommitted to consider a new measure when it was brought before us; and if there was any reason to anticipate in October that we should be all once more in agreement, then we might have taken upon ourselves the responsibility—and it would have been a grave responsibility—of leaving this question in abeyance, in spite of the danger to public order and the destruction of all public thought and business which such a Bill would be likely to cause in Ireland. But if ever we entertained such a hope, that hope has vanished. The Prime Minister has just stated that he sees no inconsistency between the speech which he made in the House on Friday and the speech which he delivered at the Foreign Office. I listened to one of these speeches. I have read them both again and again, and I entirely agree that, to my mind, they both express precisely the same ideas, and almost in the same language. Possibly, there may be a little development in the speech of Friday; but there is nothing in the slightest degree inconsistent with the speech on Thursday. And this is what I gather from those two speeches. In the first place, the Bill is not to be remodelled and is not to be reconstructed. In the second place, the Bill is not dead; it is in a state of suspended animation, and it is to be re-introduced in October. In the third place, no changes will be accepted by the Government in the Bill which are inconsistent with the scope and purpose and main lines of the Bill. And, in the last place, while the Bill itself is not to be reconstructed or remodelled, only certain clauses are to be reconstructed, especially the 24th clause, and that exclusively with reference to one point in the Bill—namely, the maintenance of the Irish representation. I believe I have stated almost the exact words of the Prime Minister. It is clear to my mind that anyone who now votes for the second reading of this Bill will be logically and honourably committed to vote for the second reading of a similar Bill, or of the same Bill if it should be re-introduced in October next. And not only so, but he is committed to something more than the principle of the Bill as it has been defined by the Prime Minister. He is committed to the main lines—that is to say, the general plan of the Bill. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented; and cries of “No, no!”] Well, this is the view I take. I cannot understand what the “main lines” of a Bill mean if they do not mean what I stated. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said at the Foreign Office—

“Of course, we should have the advantage of considering any other method which might appear useful, and it is very possible that that might aid in carrying out the principle and the purpose of the Bill and its main outlines, from which I cannot hold out any expectation of our departing.”

[Mr. GLADSTONE: Outlines.] I see I have made a slight mistake; but I think the alteration will go far to confirm the impression which I have already stated. I said “main lines;” it should have been “outlines;” but the word “outlines” still more clearly defines, in my mind, what I think the Prime Minister had in his mind—namely, that if you commit yourselves to the second reading of this Bill you are committed to the general scope and plan of the Bill. It does not mean that you are committed to all the details of the Bill, or to all the clauses; but the Bill affords a method of carrying out the principle, and you are committed to the outlines of that method by voting for the second reading. If that is the state of the case, what is our position? We have to consider—I hope I have considered with a due sense of the responsibility attaching to every hon. Member who has to vote on this question—whether the alterations which the Prime Minister has offered to us to meet our objections in regard to this one point of the Bill do cover those objections. Those alterations have entire reference to the question of the maintenance of Irish representation in this House. And here I must just turn aside for a moment to notice a remark which was made in the very able, eloquent, and interesting speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell). I listened to that speech with a great deal of delight and interest; but there was one point in it to which I take exception. He accused me of inconsistency in this matter, because he said that, in 1874, I advocated the exclusion of Irish Members from this Assembly—[Mr. T. P. O’CONNOR: So you did.]—whereas now I am urging their retention. Well, Sir, that is an entire mistake. I never in 1874, nor at any other time, advocated the exclusion of Irish Members from Westminster; and I will tell my hon. and learned Friend how this mistake has arisen. I was then engaged in the General Election at Sheffield. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Mundella) stood against Home Rule, I in favour of it. He won the seat, and I lost it. Well, Sir, in the course of that campaign I had to make, I think, about 30 speeches, and I had to answer, as the custom is at Sheffield, hundreds and hundreds of questions; and it is upon a misreported answer to one of these hundreds of questions that the misapprehension of my hon. and learned Friend has been founded. But anyone who cares to go back to this ancient history will find the whole tenour and gist of all my speeches were in favour of the federal system on the lines—though not committing myself to the detail—of Mr. Butt's proposal; and, as everybody knows, Mr. Butt was a strenuous advocate of the full and complete representation of Ireland in the Imperial Parliament. The mistake was merely the report of an answer to a question, not a speech, and how the mistake arose I cannot say at this distance of time; but I am absolutely certain I never said anything of the kind. I hope that will clear me of any charge of personal inconsistency, although really it is a very small matter. I do not think it is necessarily political virtue that a statesman should be absolutely consistent, because I should admit—I mean to say it is very often the duty of a statesman to alter his opinions in altered circumstances; but, as a matter of fact, my record is clear in this matter. I have always held the same language on this Irish question that I hold to-day; and it does seem to me a strange thing that some of my hon. Friends should be so anxious to convict me of inconsistency, and of having changed an opinion which I expressed 12 years ago, when there is hardly one of them to-day who holds the opinions which he entertained less than 12 weeks ago. Well, Sir, why do we lay so much stress on this point of the representation of Ireland? It is not a merely technical point—it is not even the delight we take in the society of hon. Gentlemen opposite. We have always laid stress upon this, because we have said the effect of the Bill was that it not only created a Parliament in Dublin, but would also destroy the Imperial Parliament at Westminster. We have said and I maintain that the retention of the Imperial Parliament in its present form and authority is necessary for the unity of the Empire, and that without the representation of Ireland you cannot have a Parliament at Westminster which will exercise anything like an effective or authoritative supremacy. We are anxious for the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I put this to hon. Gentlemen opposite. I do not think they agree with me; but let them bear in mind that this is the issue raised by this Bill. If they do not want the Imperial Parliament to be supreme they are right in voting for it. If they do want it to be supreme they will fail in their purpose. I want to read a passage from the speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I am not going to impute to him the slightest inconsistency. I believe he has never wavered the least himself in reference to the language I am going to quote; and I believe he would speak now in exactly the same words. I only quote them because they express in better language than I could command the idea I wish to convey. This is an extract from a speech of my right hon. Friend delivered at Dalkeith in December, 1879. The right hon. Gentleman says—

“One limit, and one limit only, I know to the extension of local government. It is this. Nothing can be done, in my opinion, by any wise statesman or right-minded Briton to weaken or compromise the authority of the Imperial Parliament, because the Imperial Parliament must be supreme within these three Kingdoms, and nothing that creates a doubt upon that supremacy can be tolerated by any intelligent and patriotic man.”

That exactly expresses the opinion which I hold and which I want to impress upon the House. But is there any man here who can maintain that this Bill does not weaken the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament—that does not throw doubt upon it? Cries of “No, no!” I hear some hon. Gentlemen opposite say “No!” Well, I challenge them to get up in this House or in Ireland and say they are in favour of the continued existence of the real supremacy of the Imperial Parliament as it exists at present. Cries of “No, no!” Ah! now the House sees what hon. Members want. They are not in favour of the supremacy as it exists at present. But what my right hon. Friend said was that he would not weaken that supremacy—that he would not throw doubt upon it. Mr. Gladstone: Hear, hear! But they want to weaken it and to throw a doubt upon it, and they only support this Bill because they believe it does these things. I read very carefully the very able speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs Mr. Bryce. I imagine that he put the Constitutional question as well as it was possible to put it; and even to the uninstructed mind of a layman his doctrine seemed to be perfectly clear and conclusive. If the Prime Minister had said that he did not wish to abolish the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, the answer of my hon. Friend would be complete, for the supremacy is not abolished. It still remains—what shall I say?—as a Constitutional figment. But we want it to be a real and effective supremacy. We do not want the supremacy of the British Parliament to descend to the level of the suzerainty of the Porte over Cyprus. The Under Secretary told us that the supremacy of Parliament existed over Colonial Legislatures. Yes, Sir; but dare we exercise it? Dare we exercise it, say, upon the criminal, agrarian, religious, or educational matters of any self-governing Colony? We know that, if we did so, that Colony would at once throw off its allegiance. Are we, then, going to reduce Ireland to the position of a self-governing Colony, subject to a Constitutional supremacy which becomes a sham, and which we dare not exercise? That is the question which lies at the root of our desire that Irish Members should be retained at Westminster. Under these circumstances, I am not surprised that hon. Members opposite should object to it. Well, now, Sir, do the Amendments which my right hon. Friend has indicated meet this view? My right hon. Friend has not put before us his plan; but he has indicated sufficiently for our purpose the nature of that plan. He said at the Foreign Office that he had already promised the House that on questions of taxation Irish Members would be invited to take their part in our deliberations. The word was "invited." Afterwards he said that, with regard to Imperial affairs, and the subjects which are known as reserved subjects, he would apply the same principle as in the case of taxation. Very well, now I shall be corrected if I have mis-stated the intention of the right hon. Gentleman; but what I understand is that the idea of the Prime Minister was that, in some way or other, more or less formal, Irish Members are to be invited to debates in which they take an interest, and to be allowed to come here and share our discussions. If that is the proposal, all I can say is, that it seems to me an unsatisfactory one. It would make of the Imperial Parliament a periodic and spasmodic Body. It would have no continuous existence, and I cannot see how the Irish people can be asked to take their share in Imperial obligations if the attendance of their Representatives was governed by any plan of this kind. Let us judge it by our own experience. First, let me take one or two examples. Many Members will recollect all the circumstances attending the debate on the Vote of Credit in connection with the Russian difficulty in the East. I take it that, if such a proposal in similar circumstances should again be made, the Irish Members would be invited here to help us to pay the bill. But that is not enough. They would have the right, if they are to pay any share of the expenses, to have their part in the discussion of every question which might by any possibility arise with reference to this matter, which might help to develop the policy which in turn might make the expenditure necessary. Take the question of Egypt, which occupied a great deal too much of our time during the last Parliament. The Irish Members frequently took part in our debates. The question of Egypt was always with us; and how could Irish Members take their fair share in discussing such a policy unless they were continuously and permanently present? Under these circumstances, how could we preserve the supremacy to which I attach so much importance? The Imperial Parliament would be a fluctuating Body with a large section of its Members imperfectly informed on the subjects which they were called upon to decide; and, at the same time, they would have no adequate authority to deal with the general business of the United Kingdom. The fact is that there are two conditions necessary for maintaining, without weakening or throwing doubt upon it, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. The first is that Irish Members shall have their full, complete, and continuous representation in this House. The second is that the local Legislative Body or Bodies to be created shall be admittedly from the first subordinate bodies. If they are co-ordinate and equal, you cannot have supremacy. Equality denies supremacy by the etymological meaning of the word. Local Bodies must be, therefore, distinctly subordinate. What is the opinion in Ireland on this subject? I have here an extract from United Ireland, which I believe is edited by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. W. O'Brien). It is a very interesting paper, although its language is occasionally rather strong. But in an article headed "No Surrender" the writer says—

"The proposal to withdraw the Bill either before or after the second reading is absolutely out of the question. It would be a defeat more disastrous than could by any possibility be sustained in the Lobby. The proposal to strike out the clause excluding the Irish Members from the Westminster Parliament is no less inadmissible. We are ourselves firmly persuaded that when the question is thrashed out in Committee, and when Englishmen really understand how the duplex Irish Parliamentary power would work in practice, they will marvel how any Englishman could be insane enough to propose to keep Irishmen omnipotent at Westminster as well as at Dublin, and to place in their paths all sorts of temptations to use their omnipotence vexatiously."

I quite understand the candid statement of the writer of that article; but what we want to prevent, and will not allow if we can help it, is that Irishmen should be omnipotent either at Westminster or at Dublin. Now, I come to another question of great and cardinal importance. That is the question of Ulster. I say this is a question of cardinal importance for this reason. Irish Members have said they would rather have no Bill at all than a Bill which did not give them power to subject Ulster—Cries of "No, no!"—to the domination—

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Who said it?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. and learned Member for South Londonderry Mr. T. M. Healy not to interrupt. Gentlemen from that quarter were listened to with great patience, and every Member of this House is entitled to be received with courtesy and forbearance.

Mr. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Which did not place Ulster under the power of the dominant majority at Dublin, and which did not give the Dublin Parliament power to tax Ulster. I can quite understand that. I can quite understand that a Dublin Parliament, without the power to tax Ulster, might find itself in financial difficulties. But the question is whether it is fair to Ulster. I am not going to say anything about the armed resistance which has been threatened in Ulster. I know nothing about it. We have heard that these threats have been made before, and that they have not been followed by anything dangerous; and very likely it will be the same thing again. The other day the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) actually got up in the House and accused me of incitement to assassination and outrage. No charge could possibly be more absurd or ridiculous. I have not said a word, either in speech or writing, about physical violence in connection with this measure. I only notice the statement of the hon. Member for Cork to express the satisfaction with which I find him denouncing even the most shadowy and imaginary incitements to violence and outrage. Well, Sir, what I want to ask the House is this—if the resistance of Ulster is expressed in the usual Constitutional way, or if the resistance of a portion—and an important portion—of Ulster is expressed in the same way to any proposal for submitting them to a Dublin Parliament, will you override it, will you ignore it? I say you ought not. Now, I listened the other night to the speech of my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board Mr. Stansfeld, and really there have been so many good speeches made from the Treasury Bench in this debate that I do not know to which to give the palm. I admired his speech very much, although there was one passage in it, the interpretation placed upon which I think he should regret. I will read the exact words of my right hon. Friend. He said—

"I regard it as about the most weighty and condemnatory testimony that could be borne against us, that our former rule of Ireland has led now, at this moment, to the existence of a portion of the Irish people so divided from the rest, so hostile, so unsympathetic, so unbelieving, that no spark of Irish patriotism, as it would appear, is kindled in their breasts by the prospect of being enabled, under this system of autonomy, to contribute thus directly to the prosperity and progress of their country"—Harvard, [305, 1185]

Sir, why are the Protestants of Ulster stigmatized by my right hon. Friend as unpatriotic and unsympathetic? Why, because they are proud to belong to a greater country; because they take their share in the autonomy of the United Kingdom in which they have a part; because they cling to the traditions and the history of the United Kingdom, which is just as much their possession and heritage as it is ours; because they refuse to be cast adrift and cut away from the hopes and associations which they have hitherto cherished. I suppose if my right hon. Friend had been a Frenchman he would have denounced the people of Alsace and Lorraine as unsympathetic and unpatriotic when they refused to be re-united to Germany, and when their hearts turned towards the great country from which they were forcibly separated. I suppose if he had been an Italian he would have denounced those members of the Savoyard community who did their utmost to prevent the transfer of their country to France; and loyalty must indeed be at a discount when a passionate allegiance to the unity of the Kingdom is made a moral offence and crime by a Minister of the Crown. Sir, I was told the other night by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that I had been fanning the flame of religious bigotry. Well, if it can be shown to me that I have done that, I should say that I am heartily ashamed of it. [An hon. MEMBER: No you ought to be.] But what is the ground of this accusation? It is that in a letter which I wrote I said that the Ulster people feared, and I thought with much reason, that their material and religious interests would suffer if they were subjected to the dominance of a Parliament in Dublin.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Tyrone): If they were handed over, bound hand and foot.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: That will do just as well. I daresay I used both expressions; but if they were subjected to a dominant Parliament in Dublin, perhaps it comes to the same thing as the more allegorical expression "being handed over, bound hand and foot;" and I should have thought that a writer so practised as the hon. Member for Tyrone would have known that there is not much practical distinction between the two. That is the ground of the accusation. Now, is it a fact that the Ulster Protestants do fear for their material and their religious interests? There is no doubt whatever about it in the mind of any man who reads the papers, or attends public meetings, or knows anything at all about the state and condition of Protestant Ulster. But was I right to say they had some reason for it? Well, I belong to an extreme section of the Liberal Party, and have all my political life joined with those who would destroy every shred of religious ascendancy, by whatever sect it may be claimed. But then I think that gives me and those who think with me the right to protest against the substitution of one form of religious ascendancy for another; and I say that the Catholic Church, by its tenets and by its faith, is bound not to be content with equality, but to demand predominance. [Cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Members from Ireland think not. I will give them an authority for it. Here is a pamphlet written by the Prime Minister in 1875 on Vaticanism. The Prime Minister said then—

"It is true—it is absolutely true—that to secure rights has been, and is, the aim of Christian civilization: to destroy them, and to establish the resistless, domineering action of a purely central power is the aim of the Roman policy."

That is true, and if it were worth while to carry the argument further I could quote the statements of Catholic Bishops recently made and to the same effect. [Cries of "Quote!"] The House will appreciate the interruptions which come from a certain quarter of the House, and which do not augur very well for the peace and order of the Dublin Parliament. I say, then, that as far as concerns their religious interest the Protestants of Ulster have a right to fear a Parliament in which Catholics will be in a majority, and in which, if they are true to their creed and faith, they will endeavour to establish Catholic supremacy. But have they any ground to fear for their material interests? Well, I saw the other day that Mr. Davitt had been interviewed by the reporter of an evening newspaper. Mr. Davitt was asked upon this question of Ulster, and this is what he is reported to have said—

"Just leave them alone to us, and we will make short work of these gentry. They are not Irish, but only English and Scotch who have settled among us, and it is preposterous that they should be allowed to dictate to Irishmen how Irishmen should be governed."

MR. DILLON Mayo, E.: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to do injustice to Mr. Davitt, and I would ask him whether he is aware that Mr. Davitt has absolutely and publicly contradicted that statement and repudiated it, and stated in the same newspaper that he never said one word of it?

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir; I am not. I am much obliged to the hon. Member. I had not seen any contradiction, else I need not say I should not have quoted those words.

At the same time—well, I will not say it—I accept the contradiction. I pass on to another point. I have myself seen articles in a Nationalist newspaper which attacked the linen industry. Last night the hon. Member for South Dublin, Sir Thomas Esmonde, spoke of the linen industry in pathetic terms as an industry suffering great depression. He ought to have rejoiced, because the Nationalist papers are denouncing the linen industry of Belfast as the curse of the country. Cries of "No, no!" I have seen a series of articles in which those words are used—and in which the linenites are denounced as the curse of the country—and the linen industry of Belfast is described as an Orange industry. All I can say is that as long as these articles are written and these views expressed I am not surprised that the people of Ulster look with some dread to the anticipation of a Parliament in which their interests will be so subjected. But, after all, the question is not whether these fears are well founded or the reverse. They exist, and the question is, are you going to give effect to them? What did the Prime Minister say upon that subject? It is rather a long quotation, but the importance of it justifies me reading it to the House. In his speech on the introduction of the Bill my right hon. Friend said—

"Various schemes, short of releasing the demand of Ireland for large, have been proposed on behalf of Ulster. One scheme is, that Ulster itself, or, perhaps, with the appearance of reason, a portion of Ulster—

I just stop here to say that I have been accused of using the words "Protestant" Ulster, and it appears to have been thought that I intended to convey that the whole of Ulster was Protestant. What I meant was, to limit my remarks to a portion of Ulster—to that portion which is chiefly entitled to consideration, as being inhabited generally by a Protestant population, and the Prime Minister seems to have the same idea—

"A portion of Ulster should be excluded from the operation of the Bill we are about to introduce. Another scheme is that a separate authority should be provided for Ulster or for a portion of Ulster. Another scheme is, that certain rights with regard to certain subjects—such, for example, as education and other subjects—should be reserved and should be placed, to a certain extent, under the control of Provincial Councils. These I think are the suggestions which have been put in different shapes, there may be others. But what I wish to say of them is this—there is no one of them which has appeared to us to be so completely justified, either on its merits or by the weight of opinion supporting and recommending it, as to warrant our including it in the Bill, and proposing it to Parliament upon our responsibility. What we think is, that such suggestions deserve careful and impartial consideration. It may be that that free discussion, which I have no doubt will largely take place after a Bill such as we propose shall have been laid on the Table of the House, may give to one of these proposals, or to some other proposal, a practicable form, and that some such plan may be found to be recommended by a general or predominating approval. If it should be so, it will, at our hands, have the most favourable consideration, with every disposition to do what duty may appear to recommend." A. Howard, 324, 1885-6.

Sir, that statement was perfectly satisfactory to me. I always thought the question of Ulster an open question, and I have never made the question of Ulster a question that should decide my vote on the second reading. But I think the time has come when the Government may give us some further information. I should like to ask them whether or not they have convinced themselves that there is in Ulster, or any portion of Ulster, inhabited by an intelligent and energetic population, such a predominating sentiment as deserves separate consideration; and whether in that case they have devised, or will devise, a plan for giving that favourable consideration which the Prime Minister has promised. I pass on to some other points which I shall deal with very briefly, but which raise a rather important question—I mean the points connected with the financial proposals of the Bill, and also those clauses which deal with the protection of minorities. Now, I have criticized those clauses on a previous occasion, and I have laid myself open to the very fair remark of the Prime Minister, that in doing so I am more Irish than the Irish themselves, since I complain of what they approve, or, at all events, do not oppose. I want, however, to point out this, that I have directed attention to this matter not because I have the slightest desire to relieve hon. Gentlemen opposite of provisions to which they are indifferent, but because, unless we can be certain that this scheme will be satisfactory to the Irish people—not merely to those Representatives who may be here to-day, but to the Irish people—there is no hope of that finality which we are promised in connection with this legislation. Now, surely that is a very important point. To my mind it is of superlative importance, and I really think much as I dislike this Bill, if I could have honestly convinced myself that it was to be accepted as a final settlement—I do not mean absolutely a final settlement, but practically a final settlement for our time—I believe I should have voted for the Bill, bad as I think it to be. But I do not think there is any finality about it. Now, on what grounds can the House be expected to believe that this measure is a final measure? Only on two grounds. The first would be that the provisions of the Bill are so favourable that the more the Irish people know of them—the greater their practical acquaintance with them—the more they would like them, and the less likely would they be to change them. That is the first. The second ground would be that although the provisions of the Bill were not altogether satisfactory, yet, having been loyally accepted by the Representatives of Ireland, the people of Ireland would consider themselves bound by the decision of their Representatives. Now, is that so? Let us see as to the first ground. Are the terms so satisfactory to the Irish people that they would become more and more enamoured of them as time goes on? I was much struck with the remarks in the speech of the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay)—a most wonderfully well-reasoned speech if I may venture to say so. One paragraph caught my attention particularly. It was when he said if this Bill were offered to the people of Scotland they would reject it. ["Hear, hear!" and murmurs.] Is there any Scottish Member who will get up and deny that? I do not believe that this Bill would be looked at in Scotland as a settlement of the national opinion in that country; and that is a very remarkable thing, because when we are told that this Bill is a concession to national sentiment, remember that the national sentiment lasts more strongly and in a more intense form—national patriotism—in Scotland than in any other part of the United Kingdom; and—if I may say so without offence to the Irish Members—I would say with greater reason, because Scotland has been an independent country, separate and homogeneous, well able to take care of itself for centuries, while Ireland was a dependent Province divided among themselves. Well, the national sentiment of Scotland would not be conciliated by this Bill. The people of Scotland did not wish to dissociate themselves from the policy, obligations, and responsibilities of the Empire; but the people of Scotland would be content—their national sentiment would be satisfied—this intense feeling, which is as strong as any possessed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, would be satisfied by concessions much less extravagant—if I may use the word—than those contained in this Bill, which would give a local autonomy to Scotland, and, at the same time, preserve unquestioned and undoubted the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. The second point is—Have the Irish Members loyally accepted the provisions of this Bill? [An hon. MEMBER: Yes.] Well, I am not certain. I am not certain they have accepted all the provisions of this Bill. I think they have objected to some very important reservations. But suppose, in order to obtain the greater object, they yield on these matters; suppose they come down here and tell us—which they have not done yet—that they accept this Bill as a final settlement, and that then they found the people of Ireland are not satisfied. I ask the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell)—Can he bind the people of Ireland to accept his Leadership if he accepts this as a final settlement of the question between Ireland and Great Britain? I am now going to quote the hon. Member for Cork; and I must say that hon. Members from Ireland opposite are the most unfortunate people in the world, in that they always seem to be badly reported. But on this occasion I have furnished myself, not only with the words, but the place, the time, and the paper which is the authority for the report; and I hope the hon. Member will find that I am quoting him correctly. He was speaking at Cork on January 21 of last year, and he is reported in The Freeman's Journal, which I suppose is a friendly newspaper. He said—

"We cannot ask for less than restitution of Grattan's Parliament with its important privileges and wide and far-reaching Constitution. We cannot, under the British Constitution, ask for more than the restitution of Grattan's Parliament; but no man has the right to fix the boundary to the march of a nation. No man has a right to say to his country, 'Thus far

"shall thou go and no farther," and we have never attempted to fix the ne plus ultra to the progress of Ireland's nationhood, and we never shall. But, gentlemen, while we leave these things to time and circumstances and the future, we must each one of us resolve in our own hearts that we shall at all times do everything that within us lies to obtain for Ireland the fullest measure of her own rights."

These are very eloquent words, and they do credit to the head and heart of the hon. Member; but what hope is there of finality in those words? Is this Bill Grattan's Parliament? Remember Grattan's Parliament is the minimum for which the hon. Member thought he was entitled to ask in January, 1835. This is not Grattan's Parliament, and it is nothing like it; and the hon. Member, unless he gets up now and denies that that is his opinion, is precluded by that speech from pretending that this Bill is a final measure in any sense. Well, there is another speech. This was delivered on November 3 at Mayo, and it is reported in United Ireland. He said—

"Speaking for myself, and I believe for the Irish people and for all my colleagues, I have to declare that we will never accept, either expressly or implied, anything but the full and complete right to arrange our own affairs and make our land a nation, to secure for her, free from outside control, the right to direct her own course among the people of the world."

Again I say, very eloquent. It may be very right, but it is not in this Bill. This is not a final measure, under these circumstances, if the hope of finality is to be grounded upon the statements of the hon. Member opposite. I have one other quotation which I commend to the notice of some of my Liberal Friends near me. This was a speech delivered at Wicklow on October 5, 1855. I am sorry I could not get an Irish report; but I take the report from The Times. It is a verbatim report, and, unless The Times reports him much worse than it does me, I do not think he has much cause to complain. He says—

"I claim the right to say that if the Irish Parliament of the future considers that there are certain industries in Ireland which can be benefited by Protection, which can be nursed by Protection, and which can be placed on such a position as to enable them to compete with similar industries in other countries, it is one of Protection extending over a few years, that Parliament ought to have power to carry out that policy. It is not for me to pretend the extent to which that power should be used. I tell English Radicals and English Liberals that it is not for me to pretend the extent to which to do justice to Ireland when with motives of selfishness they refuse to repair that most manifest injustice of all—namely, the destruction of our manufactures by England in times past—when they refuse to repair that injustice by giving us the power which we think would be sufficient to enable us to build up those comparatively few industries which Ireland is adapted by her circumstances to excel in."

Now, Sir, what is that? So far as the hon. Member for Cork is concerned, unless he has changed his opinion, it is perfectly useless for English Radicals and English Liberals to give him this Bill, unless they are prepared to go further and give him the control of Customs and Excise, to enable him to build up special industries by protective duties. Upon this question of finality I want to say a word upon a matter which has been referred to very often in this debate, and which I think is most important and interesting as an illustration. I refer to the case of Canada. It is curious that in the case of Canada you can find a precedent for almost every point which has been raised in the course of this debate. The Prime Minister referred to the case of Canada; and I think I state his argument correctly when I say that he considered the condition of Canada in 1838, before the Rebellion, might be looked to as analogous to the condition of Ireland now; it was a condition of great discontent, and of agitation, which culminated in actual rebellion. Then I thought he went on to show that the reforms which were subsequently granted to Canada on the Report of Lord Durham produced the pacification of the country; and I think, in his mind at all events, he compared the reforms advocated by Lord Durham with the present Bill, and he argued that the present Bill would do for Ireland what Lord Durham's reforms had done for Canada. Now, that, I think, was the position of the Prime Minister. But I confess—having read very carefully the history of that time by more than one authority—that I think it points to a totally different conclusion. My view I will state in a sentence. My view is that Lower Canada—I will not deal with Upper Canada, which is another matter and altogether different—was really, in 1838, in very much the same condition as Ireland will be if this Bill is passed; and that the reforms of Lord Durham are the further reforms which we shall have to grant after this Bill is passed, in order to secure the pacification of Ireland. Let me follow that out. What was the position of Lower Canada? It was a country inhabited by two peoples—two races—of two religions. The great majority of the population were French Catholics; and there was a very energetic, strenuous minority of British settlers who were Protestants. There was a Constitution under which Canada contributed nothing to the Imperial Expenditure, and had no part in Imperial policy. There was a Constitution which gave to Canada, in the first place, a Legislative Assembly, which was returned by the majority, who were the dominant Party in it; and, in the second place, there was a Legislative Council, which really was curiously analogous, not exactly in detail, but in its effect, to the first Order which is proposed in this Bill, and which was a nominated Council, nominated in order to secure the representation of the Protestant minority, and to give them an effective veto over the proceedings of the popular and Legislative Chamber. Now, that was the state of things, and that is curiously like what the state of things would be in Ireland under this Bill. But what happened? In the first place, the French Canadians—but I am omitting one point, the curious case of the Revenues of Canada. The Revenues of Canada were of three kinds. There were the taxes which had been levied in Canada previous to 1774; there were the taxes which had been levied by the Canadian Parliament after 1774; and there were the hereditary Revenues of the Crown. Canada had only power over the taxes which had been levied since 1774; and the first complaint made, as it would be the first complaint under this Bill, was that the Canadian Legislature was not intrusted with the control of its own finances. A demand was made to the British Parliament that they should give up to the control of the Lieutenant Governor all taxes which had been levied previous to 1774. That demand was extorted from the British Parliament under the threat of rebellion and agitation. But the concession of that demand did not stop the agitation. The Canadians went on demanding the control of the hereditary Revenue, and, in fact, the full control of the whole Revenues of the Provinces, and they asked for more—they asked that the Legislative Council should be done away with; that it should be made elective, and elected practically under the same conditions as a popular body; and, in fact, that all the arrangements for the protection of the minority should be done away with. Now, that is exactly parallel to what I anticipate under this Bill. You will have to give to Ireland all the reforms granted after Lord Durham's Act; you will have to give them their practical independence, because there is no use denying the fact that, at this moment, the self-governing Colony of Canada is practically independent. The Dominion Parliament has only to pass a Resolution desiring to cast off its allegiance, and there is not a man in this House who will hold up his hand against it. Therefore, we see, first, inadequate concessions, then a demand for greater concessions, then entire separation. It is a fatal decline. There is no finality in this Bill, and until you come to separation you cannot possibly stop or pacify the demands represented by those hon. Members on the Benches opposite. I have one other word to say about Canada. It has been made a constant demand upon us that we should produce a plan. Yes; hon. Members from Ireland opposite are very anxious indeed about the details of our plan. I paid attention to the demand made in this connection by the Prime Minister; and I endeavoured, with great submission, to suggest the alternative lines on which it seemed to me that we should have proceeded. The result was not very encouraging. Our attempt to meet the wish which was expressed has been hailed with ridicule; we have been told that our plan is "Popkin's plan," and we are described as "puny whipsters" by the hon. and learned Member for South Londonderry Mr. Healy. It is all very well for the hon. and learned Member, with his magnificent physique, to stigmatize as "puny whipsters" men not gifted by Providence with his great personal gifts; but it is very hard upon us that we should be accused of arrogance, and presumption, and self-conceit, because we did not volunteer information, but because we endeavoured honestly to meet the demand made upon us by the Prime Minister for an alternative scheme. But now I will give you an alternative scheme in even greater detail, though it will not add much to your information. You may find—I will not say the details—but the lines of such a plan in the present Constitution of Canada; not, however, in the relations between Canada and this country—those are the wrong lines, and lines against which I protest, and which mean separation, but in the relations inter se of the Provinces of Canada and the Dominion Parliament. Those are the relations which I, for one, am perfectly prepared to establish to-morrow between this country and Ireland. Let us see what the differences are. In the first place, there is that question of Ulster. Someone—I forget who it was—in the course of this debate referred to the Constitution of 1840, which united the two Provinces of Canada. Yes; but the Union did not answer; it led to quarrels, to agitation, to irritation, and even violence; and in 1865 the Constitution was changed, and these two Provinces were separated. Now, they have each their separate autonomy, under the authority of the Dominion Parliament. In that way you might have Provincial Assemblies in Ireland, under the authority of the Imperial Parliament. Then, again, in the Dominion Parliament there is complete and continuous representation of every part of the Dominion. They are represented proportionately according to their numbers; they are represented continuously and fully. In the third place, there is absolute and effective supremacy of the Dominion Parliament over the Provincial Legislatures. There is a veto which can be, and is, used; there is a right of concurrent legislation which can be, and is, used; and the Provincial Assemblies are subordinate bodies, with distinctly defined rights of legislation expressly given to them by Statute. Those are great differences, but there is another difference—one of detail, but not of small importance—the legislation as to Criminal Law and procedure. Where does it rest in Canada? Not with the Local Assemblies, but with the Dominion Parliament. And the Judges of the land, by whom are they appointed, and to whom are they responsible? They are appointed by the Governor General, and paid by the Dominion Parliament. In that way the Judges of Canada are independent, and are not likely to be affected by local influences, which might prevail in smaller and subordinate bodies. Well, Sir, I think I have occupied the time of the House long enough—longer than I intended; but I hope that, at all events, I have made my position clear. I do not want to be in the least degree mistaken by hon. Members from Ireland on the Benches opposite, or by anyone else, as to the opinions I hold, and which are identical with those which I have written and expressed before on many occasions. It will appear to the House that my objections to the Bill, as it stands, are unchanged. I cannot see that the Amendments which have been suggested by the Prime Minister would meet those objections in any considerable measure; therefore, I feel it my duty to vote against the second reading. We are threatened with a Dissolution; a Dissolution has no terrors for me. Of one thing I am confident—and I know something about the matter—that the Unionist majority in this House will be strengthened. I am very sorry that this Parliament, from which so much was expected, should have had but a brief and barren existence; but I am glad that this great issue, having been raised, is to be submitted to the only tribunal whose decision we can all accept, and which is competent to pronounce it. We also appeal to Caesar. I was told the other night by the hon. Member for the Irish Ward in Liverpool—‘Cries of Division!’—I beg pardon, the Irish Division Mr. T. P. O’Connor that the British democracy were going to give a unanimous vote in favour of this Bill. I do not recognize the hon. Member as any authority on the British democracy; he may be an authority on the Irish democracy—although I do not think that he resides very much in that country himself—but for the British democracy he is not entitled to speak. There is one admission I will make. Two things have become clear during the controversy which has taken place in the country; one is that the British democracy has a passionate devotion to the Prime Minister—a devotion earned and deserved by 50 years of public service, and that sentiment is as honourable to him as it is to those who feel and express it. But there is another thing which has also come out—that is, the sentiment—the universality and completeness of which, I dare say, has taken many of us by surprise—in favour of some form of Home Rule to Ireland, which will give to the Irish people some greater control over their own affairs. On these two things I believe the British democracy is practically unanimous; but they are not unanimous as to the methods by which it has been sought to establish this principle. Anyone who will look to the Resolutions of Liberal Associations—anyone who will read the speeches of prominent Radicals and Liberals—will see that there is the greatest difference of opinion as to the particular provisions of this Bill, and hardly anyone approves of it unreservedly. Most of them take the same objections which I have been urging. It is upon the method and plan of the Bill that we are going to the country, and not upon its principle. I have said before, and I say it again—“Give me the principle without the Bill and I will vote for it.” But I will not vote for the method by which it is sought to establish the principle. But we are going to the country, and I hope that we shall go in a more amiable temper than has recently been displayed in some quarters. I have been myself assailed with extraordinary bitterness because I have exercised an independent judgment in a matter which I believe to be vital to the interests of the country. I have been told that I am animated by personal spite and private spleen. Yes; I do not complain of hon. Members from Ireland taking that view and expressing it—it is their habit of controversy. No one has ever been opposed to them in politics but he has been covered with virulent abuse and misrepresentation, and none more conspicuously than Earl Spencer and the Prime Minister, whom they are now loading with fulsome adulation. But I address myself to my hon. Friends around me, from whom I have the misfortune to differ. I ask them to consider whether it is really necessary to impute the basest motives to public men at a time when there are on the surface reasons—perfectly honourable reasons—which may sufficiently account for their conduct? Do you say—do you dare to say—that my right hon. Friend and Colleague in the representation of Birmingham (Mr. Bright) is animated by personal spleen and spite? He takes the same course as I do; he is going into the Lobby against this Bill and against the friend, the associate, and the Leader whom he has followed with loyal devotion for many years of his life. My right hon. Friend and Colleague has done as great services, he has lived almost as long in public life, as the Prime Minister himself, and no one has doubted his honour. But you say that I am in a different position. And why do you say that? What I am saying now I expressed in public—it is in print—before the General Election, before I was a Member of the Government, before I had the slightest conception that any idea of this kind was fermenting then—if it was fermenting—in the mind of the Prime Minister. I spoke at Warrington in September, 1885, and I referred to the demands of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and I said then that if there was any party or any man that was willing to yield to those demands in order to purchase his support I would have no part in the competition. And then many of my hon. Friends, whom I see around me, thanked me in public for what they thought that plain, frank, and courageous declaration; and now, forsooth, for having made the same declaration some three months later, when the occasion has arisen, they accuse me of personal and unworthy motives. Sir, the charge is unjust and the charge is ridiculous. For there is not a man here who does not know that every personal and political interest would lead me to cast in my lot with the Prime Minister. Why, Sir, not a day passes in which I do not receive dozens or scores of letters urging and beseeching me for my own sake to vote for the Bill, and to “dish the Whigs.” Well, Sir, the temptation is no doubt a great one; but, after all, I am not base enough to serve my personal ambition by betraying my country; and I am convinced that when the heat of this discussion is passed and over, Liberals will not judge harshly those who have pursued what they honestly believed to be the path of duty, even although it may lead to the disruption of Party ties, and to the loss of the influence and power which it is the legitimate ambition of every man to seek among his political friends and associates.

MR. SEXTON (Sligo, S.): Sir, I trust that the physique of hon. Members of this House will not be held to have a very practical bearing on these great issues before us; and whatever may be contributed in the debates on these great questions, hon. Members will agree with me that in the matter of physique the right hon. Gentleman opposite Mr. J. Chamberlain has very little to boast of as compared with my hon. and learned Friend Mr. Healy. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that a Dissolution has no terrors for him. Why should it? The right hon. Gentleman will go the country masquerading as a Unionist Liberal, but depending on the regular Tory vote. The right hon. Gentleman has already found a very good godfather in the shape of Lord Brabourne. Lord Brabourne has appealed to the Tory electors of West Birmingham to save the right hon. Gentleman from political extinction. Did ever misfortune make an ex-Radical Liberal acquainted with a stranger bed-fellow than Lord Brabourne? The right hon. Gentleman has made a very misleading allusion to the case of Canada. The analogy between Canada and Ireland rests not on details but on principles. The principles of resemblance are that Canada was discontented and rebellious till she got what she wanted, and when she obtained what she wanted she became contented and loyal. The difference between Canada and Ireland is this—that Canada is 3,000 miles away, whilst Ireland is three hours' sail of this country. When Canada got what she wanted she became loyal and contented, and the substance of what we want is contained in the pages of this Bill; and if that Bill passed into law the settlement arrived at in the case of Canada will be precisely and absolutely reproduced in the case of Ireland. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman has been welcome to us in one respect. It has cleared away the smoke from the field of battle. It has defined the opposing hosts. It has enabled Ireland to see at last, beyond the possibility of a doubt, who are her enemies and who are her friends. It has enabled her to distinguish between the true friends and the false ones, and I promise the right hon. Gentleman that so long as this generation of men lasts on the face of the earth Ireland will never forget this day. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman for weeks past has been fighting under cover. At last we have got him in the open, and we mean, until this question is finally settled, not to let him get back into the bush. He has been fighting under cover by means of a series of mysterious paragraphs and dubious and suggestive little lists, and he has been creating a certain effect by secret meetings of a small but not homogeneous body of hon. Members of this House, who have produced excellent stage effects under the guidance of an adjutant in the shape of the hon. Member for Barrow-in-Furness (Mr. Cairns) by a series of rapid and interesting evolutions. It requires an effort of memory to recall the fact that the right hon. Gentleman was but lately a Radical Leader. The Radicals of Britain looked to him to maintain the rights and to assert the principles of the working population of this country against monopoly and exclusive class privilege. The working men of England looked to him to mould the policy of the Liberal Party, and influence the mind of the Prime Minister and the Government for their advantage; but the right hon. Gentleman, who might be powerful as a coadjutor, is fated to be impotent as a rebel. In what character does the right hon. Gentleman address the House to-day? It is as the ally of Tories, as the confederate of Whigs, as the deserter of his Party, as one who contrives the downfall of the Prime Minister, the break-up of the Liberal Party, the destruction of that Party as a weapon and an instrument of progress. He appears as one who, whatever the purpose of his conduct may be—and I do not feel called upon to analyze it—whatever his purpose is—the effect of it, if he was successful, could not be other than this—to give over the working men of England to the advocates and champions of class privileges and monopoly. He appears to consider the people of unfortunate Ireland—who have had given to them by the Prime Minister a Bill which affords a glimpse of freedom—he appears to consider these unfortunate people worthy only to be handed over and consigned to the double policy of Lord Salisbury—namely, the enforced emigration or expatriation of 1,000,000 of Irish people, and a firm and unflinching repression of 20 years' stern coercion. We hear a great deal about "one man government;" but probe the question to the bottom, and, in my opinion, in all ques-

It is as the ally of Tories, as the confederate of Whigs, as the deserter of his Party, as one who contrives the downfall of the Prime Minister, the break-up of the Liberal Party, the destruction of that Party as a weapon and an instrument of progress. He appears as one who, whatever the purpose of his conduct may be—and I do not feel called upon to analyze it—whatever his purpose is—the effect of it, if he was successful, could not be other than this—to give over the working men of England to the advocates and champions of class privileges and monopoly. He appears to consider the people of unfortunate Ireland—who have had given to them by the Prime Minister a Bill which affords a glimpse of freedom—he appears to consider those unfortunate people worthy only to be handed over and consigned to the double policy of Lord Salisbury—namely, the enforced emigration or expatriation of 1,000,000 of Irish people, and a firm and unflinching repression of 20 years' stern coercion. We hear a great deal about "one man government;" but probe the question to the bottom, and, in my opinion, in all questions of the kind it will always be, and continue to be, a question between one man and another. The question for the Liberal Party is, which one man will it have? The Prime Minister occupied a place in the Government of this country when the right hon. Gentleman opposite occupied a perambulator, or some similar unpretending structure. The Prime Minister directed the policy of this country, guided its Government, guarded its interests, protected its structure, and developed its resources at a time when the respectable, but not dazzling, talents of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Chamberlain) found an occupation in the respectable, if not dazzling, sphere of Mayor of Birmingham. Nature intended the right hon. Gentleman to be a Mayor. He is intellectually a Mayor still. I think that when the question between one man and another comes before the electors of Great Britain, the Liberal electors of Great Britain will not reject the experience and genius or the insight of the Prime Minister, by universal confession the foremost statesman and first reformer of the generation—they will not desert him and turn for aid to the ex-Mayor of Birmingham as their guide, philosopher, and friend. I cannot congratulate the right hon. Member upon the cheerfulness of his manner in speaking to-day. His voice, it appeared to me, had a hollow and sepulchral sound, as if it came from out of a cave. I believe the right hon. Gentleman does not like to have it called a cave; he prefers it being called a chasm. Well, I accept the amendment, for if you go into a cave you can come out of it when you like, even if you have to crawl out on your hands and knees—a posture to which, as far as I can learn, the right hon. Gentleman has no marked repugnance. But if you get into a chasm the chances are that will stay there; and I certainly think that the chasm, which is the result and the handiwork of the right hon. Gentleman, will prove to be the last political resting place of himself and his ingenuous adherents. The most ingenuous I take to be the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who cheered him so heartily during his speech; but the difference between the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman is that the right hon. Gentleman got afraid sitting above the Gangway, and the hon. Gentleman got afraid sitting below the Gangway. Even great political struggles have their comic and laughter-moving elements, and these are to a certain extent supplied by the hon. Member for Burnley, who reminds one of the boy in chase of the rainbow—the rainbow being an imaginary Chancellorship of the Exchequer in an impossible coalition. The chasm of the right hon. Gentleman was constructed on the Calais-Douvres principle; it had two bottoms, the second being the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) and his Friends. Neither the people of Ireland nor their friends had had any cause to regret that the Motion for the rejection of the Bill had proceeded from the noble Marquess. The Prime Minister had justly said—and the country in the depths of its intelligence has found the absolute truth of the saying—that the spirit and power of class formed the main body of the host in opposition to the Bill. It is well that the issues should be frankly laid before the country; and if the spirit and power of class do typify, as I believe they do, the opposition to the Bill, they could not find a more adequate Representative than in the person of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale. I have treated, and always shall treat, the noble Marquess with the respect which no Irishman ever fails to give to a frank and manly enemy. The noble Marquess has not gone about the country since last Session with a programme of his own, and he has not declared with many brave words that he would never join a Government unless his programme was adopted, and then accepted Office. He has not gone with the Government in order to choose a most suitable moment for ruining the Irish and Liberal measures. The noble Marquess is not moved—and certainly no one suspects him of being actuated—by any sentiments of vanity or spleen. He does not consider that his merits have not been sufficiently appreciated, neither is he burning with secret rage at the preferment of any other man. The noble Marquess is a frank and manful enemy of Home Rule for Ireland. He refused to enter into the Cabinet, although the Prime Minister had laid it down that any settlement of the Home Rule Question must be consistent with the supremacy of the Crown, with the integrity of the Empire, and the Sovereignty of the Imperial Parliament. Notwithstanding this ample accumulation of guarantees the noble Marquess refused to enter the Cabinet, because he would not tolerate the principle of Home Rule in any form. Therefore it does not devolve upon me to argue the principle of the Bill with him, as he will not accept it on any terms. I apprehend that the noble Marquess in his opposition is thinking more of Great Britain than he is of Ireland. He knows that though the Irish Party is only a small Party in the House, still it is the pioneer of great social and political reforms. He knows that their example has been fruitful in the mind of Great Britain. He apprehends that a Legislature of her own, freely enacting laws with a single mind for the good of the Irish people, would set an example that would be speedily fruitful in Great Britain, that would not be to the interest of the pretensions and powers and privileges of his class. That may be an excellent reason for the noble Marquess to oppose this Bill, but, Sir, it is a conclusive reason why the people of Great Britain should support it. The noble Marquess has offered us some mouldy crumbs of local self-government—such crumbs as may fall from the table of the Dives, and be given to the beggar at the gate. Ireland does not stand here as a beggar. Ireland asks her right, and I have never heard that the meagre benefaction that was given to Lazarus had any effect upon the rich man's ultimate destination. The noble Marquess talks vaguely of the reform of Dublin Castle; but if he had learned the alphabet of government he would know that to reform the administration of the law and leave the system of law untouched is to begin at the wrong end of the reform. If you reform the administration of the law and leave the system still untouched you do not gain more acceptance for the system of law, you only ruin the administration of it. The only way—the only permanent way—to meet the demands is to make both the law and the administration of the law accepted by the people, because they spring from their own native authority. I tell the noble Marquess that while he concerns himself with the administration of the law and leaves the fundamental system untouched he is wasting time, just as a sailor scrubbing the deck when a leak had sprung in the hold. It seemed at one time probable that the noble Marquess and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham Mr. J. Chamberlain harboured the hope of forming a Government of their own. We are told that they had a negative policy and a positive policy. In effect the negative policy was to throw out the Prime Minister, and their positive policy was to step into his place. Well, Sir, it would have been almost worth while—if such vast interests were not involved—to the cynical student of human affairs, to see how the Head of the territorial Whigs and the deposed First Consul of the Caucus would manage to get along together—how the heir of the Dukedom of Devonshire, and the patrimony belonging thereto, and the author of the doctrine of "ransom" would have agreed on a common policy. What measures would they propose—what measures of coercion or conciliation? How even they could get re-elected by their constituents—in short, how long and in what manner they would conduct the work of government with a Party not extending far beyond the limits of the Treasury Bench, with two Oppositions sitting on that side of the House and one Opposition on the other, with mediocracy supporting them, and the country brooding over the instructive spectacle of the mean talents and the limited experience of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian Mr. Gladstone consigned to a back Bench below the Gangway. But, Sir, whatever may be the question for the Liberal Party, the question for the country is not between the noble Marquess or the right hon. Member for Birmingham and the Prime Minister. The question for the country is between the Prime Minister and the Marquess of Salisbury. The noble Marquess is the only alternative to the Prime Minister—the only alternative to the policy of Home Rule and conciliation, is a policy of forced emigration and of 20 years of coercion. We have not learned that from what the Tories say in this House. Here the Tory Leaders are very silent. I say the Tory Leaders, because I cannot recognize as a Tory Leader yet the American Gentleman the hon. Member for Ecclestone Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, who addressed this House as an officer of Militia. The Tory Leaders are silent here, but they are not silent everywhere. Indeed, I can find some reason for their silence, because it must be distressing for so astute a gentleman and so very profound a strategist as the noble Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) to be condemned to serve under a Leader who just at the wrong moment showed that he had the temper of the leader of a herd of buffaloes. The policy of the Marquess of Salisbury is plain. His alternative is, that if money is to be spent in Ireland, it is to be spent, not in buying out his friends the landlords from the hands of the Jews, but it is to be spent in carrying out the forced emigration of the Irish people. But a question precedent to the carrying out of that policy is, Will the Irish people emigrate? The Irish people never willingly leave their native land. They only leave it as a last resource, and when they are without hope of getting a living in it. But are they without hope now? The Prime Minister has told them that their claim is expedient—that their demand for self-government is just and right, and that it ought to be acceded to. That declaration is adopted by the bulk of the Liberal Party. It has been enthusiastically affirmed by great assemblies of Englishmen, and with that moral and physical strength on their side the Irish people shall never be driven from the land that they are destined to rule. Why, Sir, if you emigrate 1,000,000, and turn discontented men at home into bitter enemies abroad, those who remain will become more troublesome. You will have to emigrate a second 1,000,000, and a third, and when the majority are disposed of, and only the "Loyal minority" remains, the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Saunderson) will make an irresistible demand upon the British House of Commons for a separate Irish Parliament in the name of a really united Ireland. The hon. and gallant Member will, of course, then be older, though I apprehend he will never be very much wiser, and, I have no doubt, in him the Government would find a much more troublesome and turbulent neighbour than my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork. But emigration or no emigration, we are to have 20 years of coercion. [Cries of "No, no!"] Did not the Marquess of Salisbury say that we were to have 20 years of firm and unflinching repressive government? But he also said that at the end of 20 years you might then consider whether Ireland would be in a condition fit to repeal it. How could you repeal a thing if it was not in existence? Not only did the noble Marquess say that, but his whole speech from beginning to end was consistent with no other interpretation. He compared us to Hottentots in our unfitness for Home Rule. Well, tastes may differ, but I would rather be an average Hottentot, a fair average Hottentot—with such a feeling of modified spasmodic honesty and respect for his word as an average Hottentot may be supposed to possess—than be the British political Leader who crawled into Office last year by repudiating coercion, who tried to hold Office by coquetting with Home Rule, and who now had the audacity to endeavour to regain Office by favouring that which he formerly denounced, and by discrediting that which he had embraced, and who did all this in the face of the world in the lapse of one single year. The Marquess of Salisbury on May 10 told the country that the Irish people—not a section of them, but the whole Irish people—had acquired the bad habit of using knives and slugs. He also said that the Irish people—not a certain number of criminals, but the whole Irish people—had used no other weapon of political controversy than the murder of agents and landlords and the mutilation of cattle. Well, I tell the noble Marquess that if we had used no other weapon of political controversy than he stated he would not have been in power last year. He says that our Church—the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland—is a tremendous and grievously misused weapon. I say, in the face of the world, that the Church of the people of Ireland, in the face of unexampled difficulties, has merited the admiration of all honest men by the vigour, courage, and success with which it has endeavoured in times past of terrible trial, and under bitter provocation, and has also acted in preventing the people from indulgence in excess and in reprisals. What did he say to the Irish Members? He said the Representatives of the Irish people will swear what you like. I say nothing about "swearing;" we "said" what he liked last June, but we refused to "say" what he liked last January, and hence all this recrimination. Not only does the noble Marquess deny us his confidence now, but he says he can never ask his countrymen to feel confidence in the Irish Representatives and the Irish people. If you can never feel confidence it follows necessarily that you can never give them Home Rule, and you must always coerce them. What did great experts say upon the subject of coercion? Lord Carnarvon said last year that coercion had become practically impossible. He said no sane man would propose to continue it. Did Lord Carnarvon cause a Commission of Inquiry to inquire into the sanity of his Leader? Lord Spencer also, one of the most competent living witnesses on the subject, has testified that you can no longer rely upon the coercion system of the past to rule Ireland. Does any hon. Gentleman here suppose himself as competent a witness as Lord Spencer? Is any hon. Gentleman here quite certain that if he had been placed in Lord Spencer's position he would have administered the drastic and terrible powers confided to him with the same pertinacity and courage as Lord Spencer? Sir, if I were an Englishman Lord Spencer's verdict would be final with me. I should regard him as the most competent witness, the only competent witness alive. And yet in the faces of these two Noblemen who last held the position of Viceroy of the Crown in Ireland the Marquess of Salisbury is prepared to resort to 20 years of coercion. Well, what kind of coercion must that be? Lord Carnarvon told you last summer that summary powers of magistrates, secret inquisitions, changes of venue, and packed juries had not served their purpose; coercion at that time was played out. What must your new coercion be? You must go back to the time of Cromwell, and having gone back to him you must keep his company for at least a generation; and when the generation is over, will you be any nearer to success than you are at the present moment? No, Sir, because now you are near success. A plain way is opened to you by the guiding genius of the Prime Minister, and if you pursue it the end of trouble and the certainty of peace is at hand. The passion of nationality, the sentiment of race, the determination one day or another to control the internal affairs of Ireland, maintained through 700 years of suffering and struggling, unparalleled in the history of the world, has become the Irishman's second nature. Law may satisfy it, but law can never expel it. Well, now, Sir, I come for a minute to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham Mr. J. Chamberlain. He has exposed on this and previous occasions what I may style his superficial knowledge of the subject under discussion by the remarks which he has made upon the mode of legislation in the Colonies as opposed to a system of federation. Perhaps if the right hon. Gentleman had obtained at the beginning of the Session the post which he is said to have desired—that is, Secretary of State for the Colonies—he might have learned a little more about the subject. He objects to the settlement proposed by the Prime Minister, because he says it proceeds on the lines of Colonial independence. How does it proceed on the lines of Colonial independence? Are the legislative powers of the Colonies specifically restricted? Have you in the case of any Colonial Legislature laid down the power of resumption? You have not. There is no comparison in principle between the settlement proposed for Ireland and the legislative system of, say, Cape Colony. The right hon. Gentleman favours a federal settlement. I do not know how far the public mind of Britain has advanced towards the goal. I do not know how far hon. Gentleman on this side of the House have reconciled themselves, for instance, to the establishment of six Legislatures in this country. Some people think that certain words of Mr. Burke are applicable to the argument used in a certain quarter of the House on this subject of federation—

“Hypocrisy delights in sublime speculations, for as it never intends to go beyond speculation it costs nothing to make it sublime.”

Well, whether the adoption of federation be a near or distant date, I say that the effectuation of this settlement will not be a bar but will hasten rather than retard this settlement of the Irish Question. It may be a stepping stone to ultimate federation, because you can only enter into federation on the basis either of independent States or existing Local Legislatures. When the day comes that you desire Imperial Federation, then Ireland, by reason of her existing Local Legislature, will be prepared to take her place as a member of such Federation. The right hon. Gentleman has returned to-day to the question of the retention of Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament. He has stated that the Irish Members are unfortunate in being misreported. But it was a very wonderful misreporting of his Sheffield speech. The passage which he says was misreported was distinguished by that felicity of metaphor which marks the style of the right hon. Gentleman. He said the pace of Parliament was not quick enough for him. He desired to see that pace accelerated for British Business, and said that the pace would never be accelerated so long as the Irish Members remained. The right hon. Gentleman, with that inaccuracy of mind which pervades the whole of his argument, misunderstood the point of Mr. Butt's scheme. Mr. Butt proposed to retain the Irish Members in this House. The right hon. Gentleman understood him to propose to exclude them, and on that basis the right hon. Gentleman argued that exclusion of the Irish Members was necessary in order to facilitate Business in this House. If the pace of Parliament was slow in 1874, what had it become since? It was at that time comparatively a dashing gallop. Since then it has slackened to a shuffling trot, and now, as regards English Business, it is almost at a complete standstill. Is the right hon. Gentleman opposite certain that if the Prime Minister had proposed to retain the Irish Members here, he would not have opposed this Bill upon that very ground—that the pace of Parliament required to be accelerated by the exclusion of Irish Members—and would have delivered a magnificent argument? In what plenitude of materials he would have revelled. He could point to the programmes of legislation of 1874 and 1880. He could call the attention of the country to the violent scenes and the all-night sittings in this House, to the coup d'état of Mr. Speaker Brand, to the censures and suspensions and expulsions of the Irish Members, to the abortive Rules of the Parliament of 1874, to the abortive Rules upon which you wasted an Autumn Session in 1882, to the current proceedings of the Select Committee on Procedure. He could have pointed to all this, and the right hon. Gentleman could have maintained—and I state my candid opinion that he would have maintained—that the Bill of the Prime Minister was a fatal Bill, because it proposed to retain the Irish Members at Westminster. Sir, our position upon this question is reasonable and clear and plain. Our country has been so long misgoverned, she has been so steadily and sadly neglected, her interests are so dislocated, her people so urgently require any skill that we can give, any industry and energy that we can apply, that we know that in an Irish Legislature our utmost energies for years to come should be devoted to the interests of our country. Till we get our own Parliament into something like good condition we cannot undertake further share in the management of your great estate of Great Britain. But, Sir, while we say this, we are willing to consider in a fair and candid spirit any proposal that can be made when the proper stage is reached for the retention of the Irish Members, and their due share in the transaction of Imperial affairs. But, Sir, I suspect the more than brotherly love of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham when he complained that if we were not to be retained in this House, it would be scandalous if we were taxed without being represented. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister knows as much about taxation as anybody, and I think he will confirm me when I say that the representation of Ireland in this House, so far as taxation has been concerned, has been very much more nominal and technical than real representation. The presence of Irish Members here has never within my memory, except on one occasion, affected to the extent of 1*d.* the taxation of their country; and, therefore, when urgent interests call us home, can it be wondered that we attach no great importance to the principle of taxation with representation? The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say we had a right to be heard upon questions affecting Imperial interests. But there is a difficulty in separating Imperial from British interests. Again, there is the difficulty—pointed out by the Prime Minister himself—to a Prime Minister having the confidence of Britain upon domestic questions and being thrown out by Irish votes upon an Imperial question. We see these difficulties. We do not at present see how to solve them. The Prime Minister has told us he will present a plan, and we can only say on behalf of our people that we are prepared to give that plan the most fair and unprejudiced consideration; and I think when all is over it will be found that we have put no unreasonable obstacle in the way. But what was the true motive of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain)? It was not to save us from being taxed without being represented. It was not to secure us our share in Imperial concerns. The real object of him who told us that if we accept this Bill it will degrade our country was to give us, not a Parliament, but a mock Assembly, the consideration of which would be an insult to the self-respect and a degradation of the Irish people. We accept the principle of this Bill, and I state most frankly that we ask to have one Body, and not more than one, for all Ireland, and not two Bodies for different parts of it. We ask to have a Legislature, not a Committee. We ask to have a law-making Body subject to the prerogatives of the Crown and the interpretation of the Constitutional tribunals—subject, under certain conditions, to the authority of this Parliament. But we are not willing and will never accept any Assembly in Ireland which will be liable by system and as a matter of rule to have its proceedings reviewed and its will annulled by any other Legislature. We have heard a great deal about the abstract right of legislating for the Colonies. Well, Sir, I am not a Constitutional lawyer, or a lawyer of any kind. Indeed, although the lawyers who have spoken in favour of the Bill have been as numerous and as eminent as those who have spoken against it, I think the question before us is far more a question of common sense applied to practical life than of subtlety applied to law, and I think this House would have lost nothing if all the lawyers had been suspended from the service of the House till after the second reading. An abstract right, an inherent right, is one thing—a specific provision is another. By this Bill certain powers are delegated to the Legislative Body in Ireland, and the method is defined by which at any moment the Imperial Parliament may resume them. Do not these two facts tell their own story? In my opinion, the case is made complete. To sum up the whole matter in one word, I think the supremacy resides where power resides. If you insert a specific provision, what would be the consequences? If you say in the Bill, in a set form, that the Imperial Parliament shall or may interfere at any point with the proceedings of the Irish Parliament, you do not increase your inherent power by one jot or tittle. But what do you do? You do two things fatal to the Bill. In the minds of some persons you will preserve, in the minds of others you will cancel, the moral obligation which you admit to rest upon you not to interfere with the Irish Parliament without good and sufficient cause. It would be a different thing if Ireland were 3,000 miles away. If you insert a specific provision of this kind the effect will be that you will not satisfy Ireland; that you will not rid this Parliament of the endless trouble of the Irish Question; and you will have reached the last and most desperate stage of political combativeness—the fighting of the Irish battles over again. The minority will come over from Ireland perhaps before they have exercised their veto, and ask Parliament to reverse the decision of the Irish House. The majority, of course, will follow them, and the majority and minority will fight their battles over again here, aided by amateurs and volunteers from both the British Parties. I beg to state, with every confidence, that the last state of the British Parliament will be worse than the first. Will any hon. Member, any practical man who has considered this question in the spirit of the politician and not of the theorist—will any man tell me that the practical supremacy of this Parliament is not abundantly and sufficiently safeguarded? In the first place, you reserve to this Parliament any question connected with the Crown or the Empire; and no one has suggested that the long list of exceptions and reservations in this Bill requires to be extended. In the second place, if any Bill which has passed the Irish House, or any provision in any Act, appears to raise a Constitutional question, the Lord Lieutenant, in the case of a Bill: in the case of an Act, the Secretary of State, or any suitor or other person concerned: in the case of a section of a Bill, or provision of any Act, may bring that Bill or provision under the consideration of a body of English Judges or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Does anyone suggest that those Judges are likely to tamper with the Constitution? It would be a fantastic suggestion. But these Judges are themselves removable by an Address to the Crown, and thereby the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is secured. But, then, it is said the Irish Judges may hold the Act to be right, and the English Judges that it is wrong. But in that case the decision of the Irish Judges would be liable to review in the Court of Appeal, and afterwards in the British House of Lords; and there, again, the supremacy of the British Parliament is safeguarded. Finally, Sir, if the Irish Legislature, even without exceeding its powers, passed an Act which in your opinion was contrary to public policy, what would happen? The minority could exercise its power and veto against the measure; and I must say on this point that never were a minority more tenderly dealt with than this minority of Ireland by the Prime Minister. You have one-twelfth of the elected Members, the 28 Irish Peers who may be reckoned to go solid against any popular demand, and these, with 24 other Members to fight with them, can stop the passage of any Bill for three years. Dean Swift once said that no man in his shirt could fight 11 men armed to the teeth; but one man in the Irish Parliament elected on the select franchise can defeat the will of 11 men elected by the people. I do not know what protection to minorities the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) proposes in his scheme for National Councils. In the article of last year it was proposed that they should be one-third. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister makes just the same proposal. There are the 28 Peers and the Ulster Members, besides which they will have the light, the intelligence, and the education of Ireland altogether on their side in the case of the fancy franchise, so that it is evident that in the Irish Assembly the minority will have one-third of the House. How such a minority can be said to be "bound hand and foot" to the majority I cannot understand, unless the Tory Party, which is one-third of the House, can be said to be "bound hand and foot" to the chariot of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. Well, this veto will stay the measure for three years, within which it is possible for the Imperial Parliament to summon the Members of the Irish Parliament to Westminster for the purpose of altering or repealing the Act; and if the summons is not obeyed, the House at Westminster will have power to repeal the Act, or any of the Acts passed by the Irish Legislature. So that, whether the Irish Members come or go, you will have power to alter or repeal the Bill, and, of course, any acts done in virtue of the organic powers which have been performed. A more perfect, a more absolute, and more ingenious protection and preservation of the rights and interests of Great Britain than the Prime Minister has devised I cannot imagine. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has not been afraid again to refer to the case of Ulster, with all the familiar epithets attached to it — prosperous Ulster, Protestant Ulster, loyal Ulster. As to the first epithet, prosperous, I suppose he was misled by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen), in whose opposition to this Bill I may say we rejoice. The right hon. Gentleman has always been the enemy of any measure for extending popular liberties in England as well as in Ireland; and it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman is under the impression that Providence has permitted the common class of people to increase and multiply in order to provide a sphere for the exercise of the political talent of gentlemen of assured gentility and elegant education. I rejoice for two reasons that he has been found opposing this Bill—in the first place, because everything he opposes is bound to win; and, in the second place, if he were unfortunately found in the attitude of supporting the Bill I should find myself under the painful necessity of considering whether I ought not to oppose it. The right hon. Gentleman took four counties, including the great town of Belfast and other towns, and referred to Schedule D of the Income Tax, dealing with the profits of trades, professions, and urban pursuits, and compared that with the half of Ulster which has none. He made out that Loyal Ulster was several times more wealthy than Nationalist Ulster. Well, Loyal Ulster bears in income to National Ulster the proportion of three to two. No doubt, what is called Loyal Ulster is more prosperous than the other parts of that Province, but the fact is not owing to its loyalty, but to its being on the Eastern side of the country, which is throughout the most fertile and consequently the richest. That relation is not peculiar to Ulster, because all round the rest of Ireland you will find the East is better than the West, the soil being more productive and the natural advantages greater. But Ulster upon the Income Tax assessment per head is but little more than half of Leinster upon the rateable value of property per head, and is far under Leinster. In each of these respects it is only superior to Connaught, the poorest and most neglected Province. It has the largest number of poor cabins; and Munster largely exceeds it in houses of the better class. Judged by the test of emigration, and ignorance, too, it is incredible that any claim should be put forward on behalf of Ulster. Unexpected results are disclosed by Ulster, for during the last few years the emigration has been greatest from that Province, and the ignorance is densest. If a part of Ulster is prosperous, to what is it due? Not to any cause of political history, not to any cause of race or creed, but to the fact that it was the policy of England to protect Ulster by giving Ulster custom; while you crushed out of existence manufacturing industry of Ireland in every other place, you fostered it and nourished it in Ulster. Since the passing of the Land Act that superiority has gone, and the other Provinces are gaining on the Northern one. Nor is the claim to what is called "loyalty" less unfounded. The Representatives of Ulster in that House show that the majority of the people of that Province are not loyal, or, as I prefer to term it, disloyal to the national cause. We hear of Protestant Ulster. Ulster is no more Protestant than the rest of Ireland. Leave out Belfast and at the date of the last Census the Catholics had a majority of 100,000 over the whole Province. Even including the city of Belfast the Protestants have only a majority of 70,000. Well, since the date of the last Census the emigration of Catholics from Ulster has fallen off because of the security afforded by the Land Act, whilst the emigration of the Protestants has greatly increased, especially to British North America; and if the Census could be taken to-morrow I venture to say it would be found that the Catholics are in an absolute majority. Then, what is the meaning of this talk about Protestant Ulster? We are told that it is Loyal Ulster. I say that if loyal means opposed to the national classes of Ireland Ulster is not loyal. The majority of the Members from the Province of Ulster sit below and not above the Gangway, and in proportion as you increase the Members for Ulster so in proportion you increase the national majority. What comfort would it be to the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh 'Major Saunderson' to find himself a Member of an Ulster Assembly in which the place and power of the Prime Minister were held by my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar)? The Ulster Tory Members do not want a separate Parliament for Ulster. The hon. and gallant Member has never asked for it, for very good reasons. In the first place, he and his Party would be in a minority in it. And the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would certainly place the Protestant minority of Ulster in a very disadvantageous position. The small Provincial Assembly would be uninfluenced by any national feeling. It would be uncontrolled by the presence of men trained to toleration by the experience of a wider sphere, and power would be placed in the hands of men who would be sure to use it harshly. The second reason is that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would be denounced by the whole of the civilized world as a dastard if he deserted the 300,000 Protestants scattered throughout the South and West of Ireland. These 300,000 are in the midst of a Catholic population of 3,000,000. They would never exercise a vote, they would never have a single Member in Parliament, they could not form a constituency anywhere, they would be absolutely dumb in the hands of the Legislature. Is that the protection of the minority which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham is so anxious for? Why, Sir, I will follow him as far as he likes. Take the most limited district of Ulster. In the Western part the Catholics are as 3 to 1, in the central region they are in an absolute majority. The only part in which the Protestants are in the majority is the part which comprises the county of Antrim and certain portions of Armagh and Down. Would the House consent to break up an English settlement for the sake of a district comprising Northumberland, Durham, and the North Riding of Yorkshire? Even within that limited district is there no minority? Why, Sir, there are 500,000 Protestants and 200,000 Catholics, so that if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain)—who, if he had carried out his contemplated visit to Ireland last autumn would have known a little more about it—proposes this way of protecting minorities, I must tell him that the Prime Minister is much more considerate than he is, and the minorities themselves would very soon acknowledge it. If the plan of the right hon. Gentleman was carried out you would have not one but two oppressed minorities. You would have the 200,000 Catholics and the 500,000 Protestants in the North of Ireland, and the 3,000,000 Catholics and the 300,000 Protestants in the other Provinces, so that in order to please 500,000 people, or the men who are supposed to represent them, you will outrage the feelings of 200,000 Catholics and 300,000 Protestants. If you care to pursue the fantastic theory of the right hon. Gentleman down to the point of Parish Parliament, you would not solve the question, because the Catholic population so interpenetrates every portion of Ulster that even if you had a Parliament in every parish you would still have a minority in each. There is no safe standing ground except to treat Ireland as a unit, and the demand of Ireland as the demand of the people of Ireland. I cannot too solemnly protest against the language of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Catholic Church. The spirit of aggression is as foreign to the genius of the Catholic Church as it is to the principles of modern enlightenment. Can the right hon. Gentleman point to any country in the world where Catholics are in the majority and where they oppress, persecute, or disturb in any way whatever the freedom of religion of their Protestant fellow-subjects? It is not done in France, it is not done in Italy? [An hon. MEMBER: How about Spain?] No, nor in Spain. The Protestants are as free in the City of Rome as in any city of the world. Is it done in the South American Republics? There the Governments are the least stable, and the condition of society is the most precarious, and yet there the civil and religious liberties of Protestants are unquestioned. There was a time when the Catholics of Ireland might, if they wished, have oppressed the Protestants—that was a time when the principles of toleration did not prevail as they do now; and yet I challenge any hon. Member of this House to look through the records of that Parliament of James II., formed as it was of Irish Catholic Gentlemen, and who had suffered long and grievously at the hands of Protestants, and find a single act or a single word in reference to the doctrine of toleration and equality of creeds which might not be now adopted to the honour of any of the most enlightened communities of to-day. I cast back, therefore, upon the right hon. Gentleman the imputation he has made, and I say that what I know to be true of myself, and believe to be true of my countrymen—what I know to be true of myself I solemnly declare is this—that so far from having felt the feeling of religious bigotry, I have never been able even to understand it. I believe that every peasant in Ireland has for that base and detestable sentiment the same strong feeling; and when intriguing politicians talk to us about the danger of establishing the Roman Catholic Church, although there are ample precautions against ecclesiastical supremacy in the Bill, still, if there were no precautions, I say that the Catholic Church in Ireland rests, and will rest, as all other Churches rest, on the moral strength which belong to it by the value of its work and the preciousness of its ministrations to the people. I would invite the right hon. Gentleman to look to our Protestant Leader. When he was attacked in high ecclesiastical quarters, and when an effort was made by base and disreputable intrigues to level against him the supreme authority of the Catholic Church, and when it appeared for a moment as if that supreme authority were about to be exercised in his case, history records that the Catholic people of Ireland, devoted to their Church and devoted to their country, and the Catholic priests of Ireland, devoted to their Church and to their country, but having in their mind a clear and fixed distinction between the spheres of religious duty and that of political liberty, never in one moment wavered their devotion to their Protestant Leader. Well, Sir, we have to deal not only with the critics of this measure, but with the prophets of evil. The former have attributed to the voluntary establishment of a mode of union between the two countries all the follies and all the calamities that could follow from the most bloody revolution. On the other hand, the prophets of evil have declared that the future Irish Parliament will be guilty of all the follies that could be attributed to men who are a compound of knaves and lunatics—I will not say lunatics, because if you admit a lunatic's premises you will generally find that his conclusions are just. I will rather say imbecile, for he is wrong and silly all through. It is said that this Bill leads to separation. A shell might almost be thrown from Holyhead to Kingstown; a telegram would bring troops and ships to the cities of Ireland in a day; your barracks, your forts, and your magazines are already in the country. When I hear this argument from Englishmen, I confess that, as an Irishman, I can only feel wonderment; but if I were an Englishman, conscious—proudly conscious—of what the energy of my race had done in making this Island one of the foremost nations in the world, in carrying its commerce and flag to the uttermost ends of the earth, and in maintaining up to this moment the commercial empire of the seas—if, I say, I was an Englishman conscious of the qualities of my race, I should resent as an injury and an insult the offering of any such argument to the British nation. No; the Irish people have suffered too bitterly and too long to play any idle tricks, and the House may rest assured that when they obtain their Parliament they will choose the most competent men in Ireland for the conduct of its affairs, and that those affairs will be conducted with wisdom, dignity, and good faith. There are guarantees in the Bill, and there are guarantees out of it. The two real guarantees for the maintenance of the Empire are physical force and the free consent of the people. The possession of physical force will remain with England. The free consent of the people of Ireland rests upon their interest and their affections. Their interest will be bound to you by this measure of political freedom, and their affection is sure to follow. I say, therefore, that with regard to the two permanent bases of the security of the Empire that one of them remains in undiminished force and the other will be increased. Talk about the Viceroy and the Crown. Two years ago I saw Lord Spencer pass my window in the City of Dublin. He galloped by, casting frightened glances from side to side, surrounded by a body of Guards with drawn swords in their hands. He galloped through like a General in an enemy's country. I mentioned the name of Lord Spencer, and I say there never was an Administration that will be spoken of with such bated breath by the fireside of every man in Ireland as his. But the Irish people know how to forgive and to forget. I say a light has been shed upon the character of Lord Spencer by his magnanimous conduct on this question. His conduct sheds honour upon the name of Englishmen. The Irish people perceive his constancy in trying one course, and, finding that failed, adopting another. If Lord Spencer returned to Ireland to-morrow his body-guard would be, not the Dragoons of the British Army, but the cheering multitude of the loyal majority of Ireland. [Cheers.] The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh cheers that statement. [Major SAUNDERS: No, no!] I thought I distinguished a disapproving sound from the vicinity of the hon. and gallant Member. I am willing to say that I think the disloyal minority would keep away. The other day Lord Aberdeen made a progress through the South of Ireland. He went as the Viceroy of the Queen and as the Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He was met at Kenmare by a Protestant rector and by a Catholic priest, and each of them presented an address on behalf of his congregation, and each of those addresses testified to the full belief of the people that the settlement proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would not only be accepted by the people of Ireland, but that it would be found to work out hereafter the pacification and contentment of that country. The National League band went to the railway station and met Lord Aberdeen: and what airs do you think they played? They played "God Save the Queen" and then they played "God Save Ireland;" and His Excellency very aptly and very justly remarked that he rejoiced at the new and promising combination between nationality and loyalty. I am bound to say that I read in the papers that they played "God Save the Queen" rather badly; it was an air at which they had had not much particular practice; and, in fact, there is a report that these energetic musicians stayed up all night in order to learn it. We can scarcely wonder at it, for the last time "God Save the King" was heard in Kenmare was in the year 1795, and the coincidence is instructive, for in that year Lord Fitzwilliam, a former messenger of peace to Ireland—a former messenger, whose mission, by unfortunate and miserable intrigues and by base passions, proved abortive—paid his visit to Kenmare. I hope the present mission may prove more successful. Before I sit down I must protest with all my force against the insinuation which has been made that we have put our case before the people of Britain accompanied by any threats or by any menaces. We have stood out of this controversy; we have allowed it to be freely discussed between the British people and their Leaders. If we intervene even at the present stage it is because it is no longer possible for us to be silent—it is because it is now essential that our views and opinions should be known. The people of Ireland have suffered bitterly in the past. They are now passing through a time of terrible trial, and I claim from men of all Parties in this House the admission that the Irish people are behaving with the most remarkable patience. The threats do not come from us. The threats come from the "Loyal minority." The threats come from those who have never been loyal to you—from those who have never been loyal to anything but to their own selfish interest and their own sordid gain. They now threaten to be disloyal to you and traitors to the Throne unless you allow them to keep their feet where their feet have been for so long—upon the necks of the Irish people. I do not know where the right hon. Member for West Birmingham found the growing determination on the part of Ulster to resist this Bill. Did he find it in the form of the Protestant Home Rule Association of Belfast? Did he find it in the address of 500 leading Protestants of Ulster recently presented to the Prime Minister congratulating him on his policy and hoping for its success? Did he find it in advertisements in the Press informing the police where they could find the Snider rifles, or did he find it in the Orange triumvirate above the Gangway? With regard to the hon. and gallant Member for North Down (Colonel Waring), with his threat of war, there seems to be a tone of Don Quixote in his character something more pathetic than formidable. I do not apprehend any danger from the hon. and gallant Gentleman, nor from the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston). The hon. Member for South Belfast rushed from a meeting of his supporters the other day with the exclamation—"I am going to London to stop Mr. Morley's Arms Bill?" Well, he came to London, he saw the Bill, and he was conquered, and he has since been denounced for his recreancy by the Tory organ in Ulster, because, instead of defeating the right hon. Gentleman's Bill, he walked into the Lobby with the Government as neatly as ever a ewe followed a bell-wether through a hedge. The hon. Member seems to be under the impression that the British Army will not fight him. I never heard that the British Army—especially the 30,000 Catholic soldiers in the ranks—had transferred their allegiance from Her Majesty Queen Victoria to King William of Ballykibeg. That Monarch may be excellent in many respects, but he labours under two disqualifications—he has no commissariat and he has no exchequer. Without these two qualifications it is quite impossible to keep any army in the field. The hon. Gentleman threatens that he will go through the land with the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other. [An hon. MEMBER: The rifle]—yes; with the Bible in one hand and the rifle in the other. That is an old tableau—it has not the merit of novelty—and I must say that, aware as I am that the hon. Gentleman has devoted the vigour of his career to peaceful piscatorial pursuits, I fear that he may do some harm to others with his Bible and some injury to himself with his rifle. But seriously, Sir, I think that the hon. Gentleman at his time of life would do well to consider whether even the enthu-

sianic sons of King William, when he makes his heroic speeches, are not thinking in their own secret hearts that he would fill an arm-chair much better than line a ditch. Probably, Sir, most of them suspect that a night-cap would come more readily to his hand than the rifle. But the chief of the triumvirate is the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Saunderson). He differs a good deal from the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), who is the dupe of his own imagination. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh sees through himself quite clearly, and it is not this kind of a Paladin that the British Army would be afraid of. What he relies on is the credulity of the British people. I can shed some light on the method of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, for lately in a speech in Ireland he said—

"I have had an opportunity of speaking at Chester and at Plymouth, and I have spoken in other places. I invariably saw this—that there was nothing which elicited their enthusiasm so much as when I told them that the Ulster men were ready to strike at the proper time for their defence. I intend to repeat that again and again. I said distinctly in the House of Commons that our right arms shall shrivel before we consent to be ruled by Parnell. The rest will follow as a matter of course."

I should be sorry to see anything occur to mar the statuesque appearance and martial vigour of the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but I cannot help thinking that perhaps in view of such a contingency the best service his right arm could fulfil would be to shrivel, as otherwise he may be compelled to break his word or else get himself into serious trouble. But the hon. and gallant Gentleman conducts his operations on a system, and he has explained to his friends how he does it. He has told them that if he attacked his opponents directly, you, Sir, would call him to Order. "There are Parliamentary objections," he said, "to calling a spade a spade." And then with some ingenuity I discovered the method of what may be called vicarious vituperation. Well, Sir, we are thankful to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for the hint. I know some quotations which would greatly entertain the House, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman says—

"I am happy to say you may call a man anything if it is only in a quotation."

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that you will feel yourself indebted to me for enabling you to appreciate the spirit of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's speeches in future debates in this House. But the point of my revelation of the system of the hon. and gallant Gentleman is this—that an hon. and gallant Gentleman, who, when he desires to attack his fellow-Members, does not do it on his own responsibility, but throws a shield of inverted commas between himself and the epithet, is not in my opinion the kind of man who in any emergency would face the British or any other Army. The only importance these threats have acquired has been derived from the patronage which they have received. The local inciters to disorder in Ulster are what an able journal opposed to this Bill described them—"mere fire eaters and feather heads," with this exception, that while the fire they consume is imaginary the feathers in their head are real. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) tells Ulster men that "by Heavens, their privileges are worth fighting for." When he asks them whether they are as good men as their forefathers in 1798 he awakens all the memories of horror and outrage and ruin inflicted upon a helpless and defenceless people, and in urging Ulster to charge with all its chivalry revives memories which set men's blood in flame. It is then that the conduct of hon. Gentlemen who are playing a game of "bluff," and of dependence upon the credulity of the people, acquires a seriousness not its own. Lord Salisbury, when the hon. and gallant Gentleman Major Saunderson at St. James's Hall repeated the dire threats about the shrivelling of his right arm, was so struck with the conclusiveness of the argument that he said to attempt to add force to it would be like trying to paint the lily. Lord Salisbury does not stick at a trifle, but he will not try to paint the Orange lily. He does not know this particular lily as well as we do. This particular lily stands in no need of painting. It is able to change colour of itself. It was buff once; it is orange now, and some day or other it will be green. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has placed himself in alliance with the Heads of the Tory Party in inciting a certain section of the Protestants of Ulster to the resistance of the law. He has told them that if they are "really in earnest" they are certain to have their way. What does he mean by being "really in earnest?" I think the terms are plain enough. He used these threats at a time when threats were hurtling through the air, and we heard of armed bodies of Orangemen and of the despatch of Snider rifles. Does the right hon. Gentleman expect us to believe that when he asks an excited body of factionaries in Ulster to prove that they are really in earnest he means anything else than that the will of this Parliament and the authority of the Crown should be defied by force of arms? What otherwise can he mean? The will of the men of Ulster upon this Irish question will not be traversed until the Irish Parliament comes into existence and endeavours to assert its authority; and if the men of Ulster at that stage accept the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, they will be in the position of manifest traitors to the Crown, and I do not see what can save them and the Heads of the Tory Party from the taint of constructive treason. I think, Sir, it is time that the Oath of a Privy Councillor should be read at the Table of this House. I think it is time that this House should consider the advisability of presenting an Address to the Crown inviting Her Gracious Majesty to revise the list of Privy Councillors. They talk of threats if you pass this Bill. Sir, if you pass this Bill you will have overruled these threats of the turbulent and violent minority, devoid of political power and influence in Ireland. If you fail to pass this Bill, you will have yielded to the threats of that minority. Ireland will hold it so. The Irish people all over the world will believe it, and I beg the House to remember how fatal a lesson it would be to leave it on record that, after having used the scaffold and the penal cell from generation to generation, Irishmen who merely asked the right that you now say should be conceded were refused the concession of that national right, because a faction of the people of Ireland—who were never loyal to anything except their own passions and selfishness—threatened to rise against you. Sir, guarantees have been spoken of—the guarantee that this House has for the future of Ireland is one that cannot be questioned—the great guarantee is the gratitude of the people of Ireland to the Prime Minister. He has not yet succeeded; but we are grateful to him for the intention and the desire as if success were already in his hands. Moreover, that we are grateful to him—deeply grateful to him—for having in the presence of mean and unworthy attacks upon ourselves and our people declared in the face of England and the world his confidence in us and in them. We shall never abuse that confidence. It is not a half-confidence that we in return offer the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. We appreciate the difficulties that surround him. We estimate the forces by which he is beset. We had hoped that it might have been possible for him a few days ago to have pressed forward the Bill this Session; but, reviewing in my own mind all the forces opposed to him and the character of the tactics sure to be pursued with reference to the matter, I thought and believed that after carefully reviewing the three courses indicated by him at the Foreign Office, that he announced the course most likely to defeat obstructive tactics, and accomplish a generous policy for Ireland. He has told us that he will press on this Bill, and that he anticipates at present no material amendment except with regard to that portion referring to the retention of Irish Members. For my own part, I am not sorry that the enmity to the Prime Minister and his Bill at the present moment has unequivocally expressed itself. The grievance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham is not against the Prime Minister and his Bill; his grievance is that he is not Prime Minister of England at the present moment. He is the victim of a precocious ambition. He sat for some time on the box of the Liberal coach; not like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Goschen), who was tied behind it, and who has made his progress in that reluctant manner, kicking and shouting every inch of the way. No, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham sat on the box, but he made a slight mistake as to his position there. Now, while he did not drive the coach, but only sat on the box beside the driver, still sometimes he wished to take the reins, to apply the whip, to put on the drag, sometimes to pull up, sometimes to turn aside, sometimes to regulate the pace. But, the driver, on the other hand, who had made several journeys, and had never had any serious mishap, naturally desired to regulate the pace himself. I have no doubt that the country will agree that the driver was perfectly right in his determination to do so. The right hon. Member for Birmingham not being able to regulate the pace, he wished to upset the coach. Well, the coach may be upset, but it can be set up again, and what then will become of the worthy who pulled out the lynch-pin? I think it is no evil, if the struggle is to come, that the fight shall begin at the first barricade, and the sooner the fight begins the sooner it will be ended. Sir, we have confidence in this House. This House is the first-born of the Democracy of Great Britain. I have always believed—and I still refuse to believe the contrary—that the House will be true to its origin. If it should not be so there is, happily, an appeal. We look with confidence to the appeal from this House to the country, if it is necessary. The people of England were never responsible for the shame and the guilt of misgovernment of Ireland. It was the national shame, but it never was their shame. They were misled and misinformed by a cunning Government class and by an unscrupulous Press. Now, for the first time, the people of England know the truth, and they have been told that truth with an eloquence, and a comprehensiveness, and a force that no other living man could approach. At the time of the Union only a fraction of the people had been within the pale of the Constitution; but now for the first time they know the truth, for the first time they have the power, and although the right hon. Member for East Edinburgh Mr. Gochen*, and his kind would have kept millions of Englishmen out of the franchise if they could, though they appeal to the country against the Prime Minister, I believe the appeal to England, to the men to whom the Prime Minister gave political force, will result in their using that political force in the name of justice, and that the right hon. Gentleman will be supported by a force that will be irresistible. Sir, this is a struggle between a giant and a throng of liliputians. The time is against the pigmies. They may press in upon that point, they may beset him sore, but he can call out his reserves. The liliputians succeeded in binding a countryman of the right hon. Gentleman—one named Gulliver—they bound him with very slender pack thread, but they did it because they caught him asleep. Now, I have observed the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister for some years, and I have noticed that in the course of a long Sitting he has sometimes appeared to slumber in his place; but if any hon. Gentleman tries—no matter how obscure the Member—to refer to Bulgaria or Mid Lothian, or even Kilmaisham, the right hon. Gentleman immediately opened one of his eyes, keeping the other. I presume, in reserve for emergencies. From that I gather that to catch the right hon. Gentleman asleep in public matters is not by any means easy. All the right hon. Gentleman has to do in this struggle is to keep wide awake—the Bill will be secure, and England will enable him to win. The noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale said that the Bill was dead. Sir, the Bill is not dead. The Bill is alive, and it will live; it will thrive in the hands of a living Irish nation. But I will tell the noble Marquess what is dead—his Party is dead. His Party is one of husks shed by the Liberal Party, and these husks are represented by territorial Whigs and sham Radicals. The Marquess of Salisbury took upon himself to state that in a few days this Bill would be a matter of history—it will be a matter of history, but it will be a history of one chapter closed and another opened—it will be a history of a chapter that records the end of a chapter which lasted 700 years—a chapter unequalled in misery and in shame, a chapter of tyranny, retaliation, and of persecution. It will mark the opening of a better and a happier chapter—of a chapter to last, I hope, through the ages yet to come—a chapter of justice and of mutual kindness—a chapter of prosperity and peace. Sir, I believe that in the Hall of the Irish Legislative Chamber—opposite the statue of Charles James Fox—that one great Englishman, before our time, who had the wisdom and the greatness to appreciate the justice of the Irish cause, will stand the statue of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. We who will have remembered him in his greatness—we who have seen him and heard him—will know how he feared nothing, how he dared everything where his head and conscience led him to champion the Irish cause. His memory will be a beneficent influence to the future time. History, the impartial justifier of right, will, when the passions of this struggle are stilled, when everyone of us is lying quiet in our grave, cherish his memory as one who brought to an end the woful and bitter fight between two nobly-gifted nations—the struggle between the English and the Irish people—and generations of Englishmen and of Irishmen yet unborn will bless his memory as that of him who initiated and achieved between Great Britain and Ireland a settlement sought for by this Empire, beneficial to Great Britain, satisfying to Ireland, and honourable to both our nations.

MR. CRAIG SELLAR (Lanarkshire, Partick) said, he had listened, as he was sure hon. Gentlemen generally had listened, to the last speech with admiration and interest. It was rare that they heard a speech of greater brilliancy or humour. He thought the existence of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was in itself an argument against the exclusion of the Irish Members. The House would be poorer if it wanted the power and eloquence and humour of the hon. Member. He wished, however, to bring the discussion back from the higher flights to which the hon. Member had raised it, and to deal with the subject in a more prosaic way, in order to bring some of the statements that had been made to the plain test of facts. He wished to say a few words upon a single aspect—and it might be a small aspect—of this great question which had not been touched on in this debate. It was one of very great importance, and one which went so deep into the social fabric of the Protestant community in Ireland, and might be so far-reaching in its effects for generations of Irishmen yet unborn, that he must direct attention to it. He alluded to the effect which this Bill, if it were passed into law, must inevitably have on the future of the education of the youth of Ireland. A few weeks ago he was present, in a Committee Room upstairs, at a meeting of Scottish Members, when they were addressed by three illustrious members of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland—the Moderator of the General Assembly and two of his reverend brethren. These gentlemen spoke to them in earnest, simple language, with no bitterness or sectarian animosity, but they spoke the language of conviction. They told them that though heretofore they had lived on terms of friendship and brotherhood with the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church, they looked with alarm and dismay on the proposals which they were now discussing. They told them how the Catholic clergy were active workers on the National League, and how they were working for the ascendancy of the Catholic Church. They told them what their main object was. It was to get the supreme control over the education of the youth of Ireland. What they said, and the manner in which they said it, with no bitterness or animosity, but with a settled and a painful conviction, made a deep impression on his mind, and, he thought, on the minds of all who heard it. With that impression on his mind, the question he wished to ask was this—Was this Presbyterian deputation right or was it wrong, when the members of it told them that the control of the education of the youth of Ireland was the goal at which the Roman Catholic hierarchy and priesthood of Ireland were aiming, and which they must reach if this Bill were allowed to pass? As he desired to confine his remarks to a corner of this subject, so he would confine them to the case of the Protestant minority in Ireland. There could be no objection to the Catholic majority conducting their educational system and their educational methods in whatever way seemed best to them. If they preferred a denominational to a national system where the Catholic population was alone affected, no one could take exception. In Scotland they preferred a national system, and they had a national system, but they safeguarded the rights of the Catholic and Episcopalian minority; and if he felt that they could trust the Irish Parliament and the Irish Executive to safeguard the rights of the Protestant minorities throughout Ireland, he should feel, on this point, less reluctant than he did to support the scheme of the Government. But, in looking at the scheme of the Government, he found the Government did not themselves trust the Irish Parliament or the Irish Executive in matters of education and religion. The Bill contained no less than five distinct limitations in the powers of the Irish Legislature on these subjects. They prohibited the Irish Legislature from making any laws

1' for the establishment or endowment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; 2' for imposing any disability or conferring any privilege on account of religious belief; 3' from abrogating or derogating from the right to establish or maintain any place of denominational education, or any denominational institution or charity; 4' prejudicially affecting the right of any child to attend a school receiving public money without attending the religious instruction of that school; (5' impairing without leave the rights, property, or privileges of any existing Corporation. When he read these limitations and restrictions, whether he believed in their efficacy or not, he saw by them that the Government did not trust the Irish Legislature to safeguard the rights of the minorities; and if the Government did not trust it, he asked himself what will this Irish Parliament and this Irish Executive necessarily be? He asked that question, and he answered it in the words of the Nationalist Party themselves. The answer was to be found in The United Ireland of April 10, and this was the organ of the Nationalist Party. The editor was one of the most conspicuous Members of the National Party, and this was what that paper said only a few weeks ago upon this subject—

"A National Parliament controlling Irish affairs from College Green would not be a revolutionary novelty. It would be only regularizing a system of government which is already obeyed from Donegal to Cork. The National League has already proved itself the most beneficent and capable Government with which Ireland has been for centuries endowed."

That, Sir, is a plain answer to the plain question. What will the Irish Parliament and the Irish Executive necessarily be? When he considered this, he understood how it was that the Government would not trust this Irish Legislature which it proposed to set up, and why all these limitations and restrictions were introduced into the Bill—well, what hope would there be that the rights of the Protestant minority would be safeguarded when the National League had become supreme? Would not the priests look for their reward when the League was supreme? Of course they would; and what would their reward be? That reward would be the control of the education of the youth of Ireland. There was no manner of doubt that control of the education of Ireland in all its branches—University, middle, and elementary—was what the priests had struggled for for many a year, and which, when the League was supreme, they meant to have. This was admitted by the hon. Member for Longford Mr. Justin McCarthy. But if the House required any proof of this he could supply it. Ireland, as everyone knew, had had a national system of education since 1833, and the basis of that system was united secular and separate religious instruction. Until the other night he had understood that this system was a good system. In the old days, if he mistook not, his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council Sir Lyon Playfair, considered the system was a good system, though the results were hardly adequate. But these were in the old days—the pre-salvation days.—the days before his right hon. Friend had gone to Leeds and had become a Home Ruler. Now, he told them they had been on the wrong track. We gave education to Ireland according to English ideas. "We only gave"—he quoted his right hon. Friend's words—"the sort of education which fitted people to go to prison." Surely his right hon. Friend's conversion to these Nationality doctrines of education must have been of very recent growth. Why, Sir, it will be in the recollection of the House—at any rate, it was well in the recollection of Scottish Members—that only a few months ago, when the Scottish Members, speaking for their constituents, were desirous of having education in Scotland according to Scottish ideas under a Scottish Secretary, exactly as Irish education was under an Irish Secretary, his right hon. Friend, almost alone among the Scottish Members, opposed it. He got a Select Committee formed to report against Scottish education being managed by the Scottish Secretary in this House, and out of it he preached the gospel against it—he even resigned his Scottish seat as a protest against it—and now he was a convert, at least as far as Ireland went; he was for giving education according to Irish ideas, because education according to

[Ninth Night.]

English ideas only fitted Irishmen to go to prison. He (Mr. Craig Sellar) supposed the right hon. Gentleman was now for giving education to the Scotch according to Scotch ideas. He hoped it might be so, and perhaps they should have him back among them as a Scottish Member reconciled. As to whether the priests and the Bishops in Ireland were working to secure the control of Irish education, the hon. Member pointed to the action of these clergy with regard to the "model schools" to show that, so far as elementary education goes, they are working to that end. These schools had always been the objects of their hostility. Although they had turned out some of the best teachers in Ireland, they were regarded as "intrinsically evil" by the Bishops. Parents were forbidden, under the severest ecclesiastical penalties, from sending their children to these schools; and clerical managers, of whom there were a great many in Ireland, were interdicted from employing teachers who were trained there. The reason of this hostility was well explained by one of the most distinguished of the Irish Commissioners—Sir Robert Kane—who said that the interdict had been carried out with the object of putting education in the hands of the Church authorities and establishing the Christian Brothers in place of the present schools. There could be no doubt in the mind of any man that throughout the whole of Ireland, Catholic and Protestant, the object of the Catholic hierarchy was to get control over the elementary education. With regard to higher education, he would not weary the House with argument. He would only quote The Dublin Review, a paper originally started by Cardinal Wiseman, and which was the authorized exponent of the views of the clergy. Every article in the paper was submitted to three censors, who examined its bearings on faith, morals, and other matters; and it might be therefore regarded as the true exponent of the views of the hierarchy with regard to middle education. That paper, while admitting that higher education opened a larger avenue to Catholic youth, expressed a preference that Catholic youth should be uninstructed rather than that they should be tempted to doubt the truth of their religion. In other words, it said that ignorance was the best protection for

Mr. Craig Sellar

Catholic youth against infidelity. That quotation, he thought, was sufficient to show the animus of the clergy towards middle education. The third point he wished to bring forward was with respect to Trinity College, Dublin. The relations of Trinity College and the Catholic hierarchy had often been the subject of discussion in that House. Some time ago the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt), speaking on the matter, said that if he thought the Bill which he was then speaking on would not do justice to Trinity College he would vote against it. He said that Trinity College was the "intellectual eye" of Ireland, and to hand it over to the Roman Catholics would be like permitting Ultramontane wreckers to put out all the lights on the coast of Galway. Archbishop Walsh had declared that so long as the central fortress of education in Ireland, which was not Catholic, was allowed to stand so long would it be impossible for any statesman, English or Irish, to deal with the question of education in Ireland. The hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Sullivan) had also declared that Trinity College was part of the machinery for the subjugation of Ireland, that it was a branch of English arrangements and institutions in Ireland, and was simply an English fortress. How far would they be able to attain their ends if this Bill became law? Trinity College was open to all religions, on equal terms, and without distinction. Students of any denomination, and student of every denomination and every religion, were free, as he understood it, to compete for every prize and every scholarship, and the Governing Body were subject to no religious tests. It was freer than any of our Colleges in Oxford or Cambridge, and yet, because it was a "non-Catholic"—not an "anti-Catholic"—institution, it came under the denunciation of the hierarchy. Now, what might be its fate under this Bill? Its endowments might be confiscated by taxation, and this taxation might be appropriated to any purpose which the Irish Legislature—namely, the National Legislature—might think fit, subject to the assent of the Queen in Council. Out of these revenues, therefore, another and exclusively Catholic University could be endowed, and the "intellectual eye of Ireland" would be put out, the lighthouse on the coast of ignorance and bigotry would be destroyed at the bidding of the "Ultramontane wreckers." But the same object could be effected by indirect means under this Bill. The rights of existing Corporations might be set aside by the Queen in Council on an Address presented by the Legislative Body of Ireland. As he said before, the priests had been active workers on the League. The Irish Legislature would simply be the National League. The priests had helped the League to "come to its own," as the Jacobite song said: the priests were to have their reward, and the first share of the spoils of victory which the priests would have would be that the constitution of Trinity College should be abolished in favour of a Body of a different religious complexion, and that the curriculum should be remodelled in accordance with Ultramontane ideas. The "gagging clauses" of the discarded and discredited University Bill of 1873 would be passed and put in force, and the study of history and of philosophy would be excluded from the curriculum. His right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council argued with much eloquence against this proposal in 1873. But that was in the days in which he was a Scottish Representative, and before he found salvation in his formulary about educating Ireland according to Irish ideas. But even if those subjects were retained in the curriculum, the study of history would be confined to these fragmentary extracts and one-sided text-books, which the Church approved, and the study of philosophy to formal logic and mediæval theology. The whole spirit of free inquiry would henceforth be stifled and extinguished, and a University which for centuries had been the home of unfettered science and speculation would become a mere training school of Catholic orthodoxy. But even without applying to the Queen in Council the majority in the Irish Legislature could transform the character of Trinity College. Great powers were vested in the Crown—that is, the Lord Lieutenant—under the Caroline Statutes for re-arranging the internal arrangements in the College. Hitherto these powers had not been used, except on the motion of the College itself. But there was nothing to prevent a Lord Lieutenant, acting on the advice of responsible Ministers, from carrying out all the changes which the Bishops demanded. A Parliament hostile to secular education could, without infringing a clause in the Bill, establish Catholic ascendancy inside the University. In short, Trinity College would be at the mercy of the Irish Executive for the time being, and the influences which it represented. Similarly the Irish Executive would have entire control over the appointments to the Queen's College, and even the great Presbyterian College at Belfast, in the very centre of Ulster Protestantism, could, by judicious appointments, be so manipulated that none but Catholics could attend it. He should not go down the scale from University to middle, and from middle to elementary education; but the same reasoning applied all through. Appointments on the Examining Body and on the National Board would, of course, be in the hands of a Catholic Executive, supported by a Catholic Parliament, and acting upon a Catholic Lord Lieutenant. The appointment of Inspectors would lie in the Executive, the power of granting and withholding grants, the appointment of teachers—all these would be in the hands of the Legislature—that is, of the National League. The truth was, the word "religion" need never be mentioned in the Irish Legislature, nor the words "religious endowment," or "religious disqualification," and yet elementary education could be placed under the absolute control of the Catholic Church. All that was required was a good working majority on the National Board. Then, such Inspectors and teachers as did not fall in with the views of the Board would be dismissed, grants would be withheld from heretical and nonconforming schools, and in every school throughout Ireland religion could be, and would be, according to the logical and consistent theory of Catholic education, mixed up with secular learning. Even if a Conscience Clause were introduced it would avail nothing. The stamp and impress of Catholicism would still be effectually placed upon secular education. The Catholic religion would be established and endowed in everything except in name. That was quite right in Catholic Ireland if it was only provided that the scattered Protestants in the South and West were safeguarded. He did not ask for ascendancy, but only fair play. But they would not get fair play under this Bill. The Protestant community in the South and West would find itself, even in the non-Catholic part of Ulster, obliged to choose between two alternatives—that of accepting a system of so-called national education, guided and controlled by the Catholic hierarchy, or providing schools for itself out of resources which would be hopelessly inadequate to the task. He did not think this latter alternative was possible in the present state of trade. What the Protestants of Ireland would have to face, if this Bill were allowed to pass, would be the establishment and endowment by indirect means of a single denomination—the denomination, he admitted, of the majority, but without the shadow even of protection for the consciences and claims of the minority. This was only one aspect—one corner of this question. But this aspect, this corner alone, was enough to make him and he thought the great majority of his countrymen look with anything but favour on the provisions of this Bill. Allusion had been made in the debate to “Home Rule for Scotland,” and the Prime Minister, in his recent Manifesto, put on this gaudy fly, and threw it over the people both of Scotland and of Wales to see if those nationalities would rise to it. He had no right to speak for the people of Wales. But from what he knew of them he had very much doubt if the Welsh people would be moved even by such skilful angling as that. But he had watched Scottish opinion pretty closely, and he was bound to say that, so far as his reading of Scottish opinion went, there was no demand for anything of the kind in the sense given to it in this Bill. There was a demand, and a very legitimate demand, for extended and amended local government in Scotland to manage affairs in counties and burghs on a representative instead of a nomination system. They fought the elections upon this, and they expected that before now they should have had a measure on the subject. There was a demand for this, and that demand went some way. It maintained, and rightly maintained, that there were many matters of local government—such as gas and water works, railways, bridges, harbours, tramways, and such things as were the subjects of private legislation—that these things could be done much better and much more satisfactorily in Scotland than in London; that industrial undertakings of that nature were warped and cramped and prohibited by the necessity of coming to the Imperial Parliament. To that extent there was a strong, reasonable, practical, and legitimate demand for Home Rule in Scotland—if they liked to christen it by such a name—and that was a demand which, in his opinion, ought to be granted. For the fulfilment of that demand he had worked, and should continue to work, either outside or inside Parliament, as hard as any man. But if, without presumption, he might venture to say a few words to his Colleagues from Scotland, he would ask them—Would they, or any man among them, look at such a proposal as this Irish scheme if it were offered to Scotland? Let him mention a case or two. Would they consent to be excluded from the Imperial Parliament, from all participation in the consideration of Foreign and Colonial and Imperial affairs, even at the price of a Statutory Parliament in Edinburgh? Would they consent to allow the whole Imperial policy with regard to our Indian Dependencies, which, to a large extent, had been made, and consolidated, and governed by Scotsmen, to be moulded and directed by England without their having a voice in the direction? Would they consent to have their Colonial policy, which might affect for weal or woe the lives of thousands of Scotsmen in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, to be guided exclusively by Englishmen, and the Scottish Members not to be allowed to say a word or raise a finger in the matter? Would they consent to hand over the Imperial Army and Navy, with the glorious deeds of which the names of so many illustrious Scotsmen were honourably associated—would they consent to hand over the Army and Navy of the Empire to the exclusive control of Englishmen assembled in that Parliament from which they were excluded? Scotland and Scotsmen had borne no humble part in the development of trade and navigation in the British Empire. But Scotland and Scotsmen would, if such a Bill were to be passed for Scotland, be excluded from passing any law or taking part in the discussion of any law affecting the trade and navigation of the Empire. Would any of his Colleagues consent to that? He might go through the whole list of these distinctions of limitation, and he might ask his Colleagues if they would accept any one of them, and he was perfectly certain they would not. Nay, he went further. If, last November, the Liberal Representatives for Scotland had gone to their constituencies with nothing to offer them—no reform in Procedure, no reform in the Land Laws, no reform in Local Government—nothing but this barren and impracticable measure to be offered to Ireland or to Scotland—if they had gone before the people of Scotland with nothing but this, would 60 of them have been returned? Would 30? Would the Prime Minister himself have been returned for Mid Lothian? No, Sir. We and our fantastic projects of Home Rule would have been scouted from one end of Scotland to the other. And yet that was what the Bill proposed to do for Ireland, and hon. Members on that side of the House told them that they would gladly accept these degrading conditions when applied to Ireland, and they adulated the Ministry and licked the hand of the Minister who offered them. He did not doubt the sincerity of their acceptance, nor the sincerity of their adulation, though he could not but remember the execration with which the Ministry, and that Member of the Ministry who more perhaps than any other Minister was responsible for the Bill—he meant Earl Spencer, because without Earl Spencer's co-operation the Prime Minister could not have formed his Administration—he could not but remember the execrations which only a few months ago were heaped upon this Ministry and upon that Minister by those who now adulated them. He did not doubt the sincerity of this adulation. But he did doubt if their acceptance now and their adulation were the true measure of the acceptance of this Bill in Ireland. Their professions bound themselves; they did not bind the Irish nation. They bound themselves; they did not bind their successors in Irish agitation—

"The evil that men do lives after them,

He did not believe that the pledges and promises of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had any binding effect. He believed that the acceptance of this measure, however genuine it may be for the moment, would not survive a single Dublin Parliament. It would be regarded as a mere stepping-stone to further demands—demands which would be pressed on every candidate for a seat in the Dublin Parliament. Majorities would be returned and Ministries formed upon these demands, and these demands, coming from a Statutory Parliament duly elected in Dublin, would be regarded as the Constitutional expression of Irish opinion, and which, in the end, perhaps, after a bitter Parliamentary struggle in which great historical Parties might again be rent asunder and broken to pieces, would be granted by what remained of the Imperial Parliament. It was because he saw no finality in this project, because he saw in it nothing but material for fresh agitation in Ireland, that he strenuously opposed it. The President of the Local Government Board told them the other day that he had "a message of peace on his lips, and an olive branch in his hand." This was not the first olive branch that had been sent to Ireland of late years from the Imperial Parliament. The Act for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church was an olive branch; the Land Act of 1873 was an olive branch; the Land Act of 1881 was an olive branch; and the extension of the Franchise was an olive branch. The Liberal Party was persuaded to pass those olive branches on the promise given on each occasion that it was a message of peace and a final settlement. But every one of these olive branches brought forth nothing but Dead Sea apples—beautiful to look at, but with nothing but dust inside them. And after all these messages of peace they were no nearer the settlement than they were. The more they gave the more was demanded. The demands got larger and larger; a land agitation had grown to a national agitation, and a national agitation had grown to a separatist agitation. He said there was no finality to these demands; and it was because he saw no finality in this measure—only an infinity of mischief—that with great regret and great reluctance he had come to the determination that he could not support the second reading.

Mr. INCE (Islington, E.) said, he had listened with the respect due to his hon. Friend who had just sat down Mr. Craig Sellar, whose abilities and exertions on behalf of the Liberal cause they all recognized, and he had endeavoured to ascertain from him what he had endeavoured to ascertain from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain)—namely, what on earth the question of what might be good or desirable or what might be wanted for Scotland had got to do with this Bill. The Scottish Members, faithfully representing their constituents, no doubt did not want Home Rule; did it follow from that that the Irish people should not have it? The difference between the two cases was that the Irish people desired a thing which the Scottish people did not desire. His hon. Friend might as well complain that a pigmy declined to purchase the clothes of a giant. He had listened with profound astonishment and great regret to the speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He confessed that he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman's attitude. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the principle of the Bill, and was anxious that it should be known that he was in favour of Home Rule. They were all very anxious just now to let their opinions be known to everybody. The only thing displeasing to the right hon. Gentleman was the form of the Bill. But he thought they had got rid of the form of the Bill. If there was one thing which had been made clear, it was that in voting for the second reading they were simply voting for the principle of the Bill, which was Home Rule for Ireland. He could understand and appreciate the attitude of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale, who was altogether opposed to Home Rule, and was in favour of doing nothing for Ireland. But the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who avowed that he was a Home Ruler when most of them were thinking of other things, and who had not changed his opinions, was adopting what to him appeared an utterly unintelligible course. If the right hon. Gentleman had attended the meeting at the Foreign Office—as he might well have done—he would probably have been satisfied with the explanations of the Prime Minister, which went far to meet the objections which he had raised to the Bill. And he must say this of the objections of the right hon. Gentleman—that the Government had undertaken to make alterations tending to meet the views he had contended for, and to make those alterations before the Bill was again presented to the House. But even as the Bill stood, with the alterations proposed by the Government, he could not see that the Bill failed to fall in with the object which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have so much at heart—namely, that the supremacy of Parliament should be maintained, and that the Irish Members should be retained at Westminster. The doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament was, of course, a question of Constitutional law, the answer to which must be gathered from the opinions of Constitutional lawyers. In support of this doctrine he quoted from a book written in the early portion of the 17th century, entitled "Privileges and Practice of the Parliaments in England," collected out of the Common Laws of this land," in which it was laid down that all Acts and Statutes in England were made "by the consent of the whole Realm." In other words, the House of Commons, in the eye of the law, was not a House of Delegates—it was "the Commons of England," and, with the Crown and the other Estates (the Lords Spiritual and Temporal), made up "the whole Realm"—a Body competent to do whatsoever it saw fit. That doctrine, laid down in 1640, was not then new—a little book in black letter, written by Lord Chief Justice Fortescue, in the time of Henry VI., contained precisely the same statement of the law. This doctrine of the absolute supremacy of an Act of the English Legislature did not rest on mere dicta—it had been put in execution within the present Reign. In 1833 slavery was, by general Act of the Imperial Parliament, abolished throughout the whole of the British Dominions. Some of the Colonies did not take kindly to the Act abolishing slavery, and among these the Colonies of the West Indies. Jamaica failed to take the proper steps to give effect to this alteration of the law. Jamaica at that time had a local Legislature; but the Imperial Parliament, on Jamaica's failure in duty, in the first year of the present Reign, passed an Act in which, over the head of the local Legislature, it directed that proper means should be taken for effectuating the release of the slaves. The matter did not stop there. The Legislative Assembly at Jamaica took umbrage at what Parliament had done, and refused to vote Supplies. Thereupon the Imperial Parliament passed a further Act, enabling, in need, the Governor of Jamaica, with the advice of his Council, and notwithstanding the dissent of the Assembly, to raise the moneys necessary for carrying on the Government of the Colony. Thus the House would see that, notwithstanding the existence of a local Legislature in Jamaica, the House of that day had found no difficulty in the way of asserting its supremacy. He would avow that he was by no means pleased to see a Bill of this kind introduced into the House, and he should have been very glad if the necessity for its introduction had not existed. But he could not shut his eyes to the fact that the condition of Ireland was such as demanded redress at the hands of that Assembly. It was said by some opponents of the measure that there were two races in Ireland, and in support of that assertion stress was laid on the fact that Ireland was the home of two distinctly separate religions. Those who argued in that way might say equally well that Brighton contained a separate nation because there were so many Jews there. Difference of religion did not constitute difference of race. As to the allegation that the people of Ulster would be overborne by the adherents of hon. Members below the Gangway, he thought that if there was any danger it was rather the other way, for the Gentlemen of Ulster had the sinews of war. Much as he should like to see things go on as they had gone on hitherto, in view of the state to which Ireland had been reduced by the incompetency of the English Government and of the English garrison at Dublin Castle, he could not refuse his assent to a measure which, if not absolutely final, would at any rate hold good for a considerable time, and would bring peace and quiet to the people of Ireland.

Mr. DAWSON (Leeds, E.) said, that he could not support this measure, because he believed it was neither in the interests of Great Britain nor of Ireland; but if he believed there was no alternative to it but 20 years' coercion, he would have supported it, although he did not approve of it. But he believed that the Marquess of Salisbury's policy had been wrongly described as 20 years' coercion.

The objections and doubts which he had in reference to the Bill had, in the first place, been instilled into his mind by the conduct of those who had brought the Bill into the House. It had been described as a Bill of unparalleled gravity; but instead of being, as might have been imagined, the outcome of prolonged contemplation, it was the production of a Government which, with the exception of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, was composed of Members who had previously denounced such a measure. The Under Secretary for the Local Government Board (Mr. Borlase), in his Election address, said that "Home Rule had been rendered impossible by the action of those who supported it." The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt), at Lowestoft, denounced a fancied alliance of the Tories and Parnellites; and remembering his declarations on the subject of Home Rule, and comparing them with his present views, he (Mr. Dawson) felt he might say—Quantum mutatus ab illo, Heclore. Then there was the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who, at Culross, in November, 1885, after denouncing as a political hotchpotch any plan of National Councils for England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, said that a separate Parliament and Government for Ireland would cause great difficulties, and that he "Did not think it would be likely to be consented to by Whig or Tory, because it would not be consistent with the maintenance of the integrity of the Empire and the duty to the Crown."

HON. Members were told that because a Bill brought forward in such haste as this had been laid before them by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister they were bound to pass it because Home Rule had thereby been made inevitable. Death was doubtless inevitable, but that was no reason why people should be invited to cut their own throats. Nothing was easier than to use this word "inevitable" as an argument. For instance, in 1862 the Prime Minister, in a celebrated speech that he then made, had advised the Northern States to cast loose the Southern States, because, he said—

"Just as in business transactions you could not keep in partnership a partner who was determined to leave you."

and he then said that such separation

[Ninth Night.]

was "inevitable." But the Northern States refused that advice, and separation did not and never would take place. It was desirable that the House should know exactly what they were discussing. This measure could scarcely be characterized as a Bill, because it was avowedly never intended to become law; and it was not an abstract Resolution, because it condescended to details which could not be included in an abstract Resolution, and which had been modified from time to time in obedience to the dictation of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. Therefore, they seemed to be discussing a sort of hermaphrodite. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Ince) had said he could not understand the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham on the question of the alterations to be made in the Bill. They were told that by reading this Bill a second time they would be merely affirming a general principle; and yet they were informed by the Prime Minister that this measure had been his daily and nightly thought for months, and he had occupied three hours and a-half in explaining the various details of the measure, the general principle of which he might have stated in a few minutes. But by reading the Bill a second time would the House of Commons, in fact, be merely approving a general principle? The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the only alterations that would be made when the measure was reintroduced would be in Clauses 24 and 39; and when the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) suggested that the Bill was to be "reconstructed," the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister emphatically cried "Never, never!" while he had pointedly referred to the new Bill which was to be introduced in the Autumn Session as "the Bill." They were told that a second reading only affirmed the central principle of a Bill and not its details. But this Bill contained details, each of which was of importance, superior to an ordinary Bill, and they could not be left out of consideration in voting on the second reading. For instance, there was the point of the constitution of the Irish Parliament. They were asked to establish an Upper Order with property qualifications. He thought this was an old exploded Tory principle. The democracy of England seemed to be appealed to by every hon. Member below the Gangway on both sides of the House, and the democracy of England was asked by the Government to go back to a Tory principle 150 years ago, and so produce complication. That was a very important thing to be asked to go back to 150 or 200 years ago. Then, as to the financial condition of Ireland, that was not permitted to be discussed. But what about England's security for Ireland's tribute? Here he protested against Ireland being called upon to pay a tribute. He wished to point out what had been said by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), who gave the House to understand that he would not have the Irish Parliament controlled. This was a most striking part of the hon. Gentleman's speech, who said he protested against the Irish Legislature being controlled by the English House of Commons. And yet this most important point was not to be raised on the second reading, but was to be relegated to Committee. In that case, the English Parliament were not to be permitted to consider the question of Irish landlords which might arise under the land scheme, and this similarly was to be referred to the Committee stage. There was one reason why he thought the House ought to consider these important particulars before passing the second reading of this Bill. If the House consented to read the Bill a second time the opponents would be met by this difficulty, that while they might disapprove of the Bill, they might also be divided on some points of detail, and they would find that in Committee, being divided among themselves, they would be overwhelmed by the Government. They were told that foreign opinions were in favour of this Bill. He could not forget that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was deserted by some of his former Colleagues. He was deserted by the right hon. Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), by the right hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), and by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), and he did not know how many more; and, deserted by his former Colleagues, the Prime Minister was forced to fly for solace to some American senator. Why should the English House of Commons be asked to pass a Bill like this? Why should the opinion of foreign countries be brought to bear upon the opinion of the House of Commons? Let every country manage its own affairs. The Prime Minister had referred to what he called analogous cases. The House had been asked to look at the case of Norway and Sweden; and the Government, he believed, had been asked to lay upon the Table something of a statement regarding those two countries, but they were told that there was something of a delicate nature in those statements, and that they could not be produced. Then the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs Mr. Bryce laid great stress on the case of Denmark and Iceland; but the next day he found there was a grave difficulty there—a grave Constitutional question; and in Austria and Hungary a Constitutional crisis was now proceeding. These examples were not such as to allay suspicion regarding the satisfactory and peaceful working of this Bill. One great reason why he opposed the Bill was that the Government were already pursuing that policy of judicious mixture which the Prime Minister had condemned—that policy of coercion and conciliation. Cries of "No!" Yes: they had brought in and passed a measure to prevent Irishmen carrying arms. If the people of Ireland had not a right to carry arms—and if this did not partake of the character of coercion he did not know what coercion was—they had no right to govern themselves. For himself, he took no part in the Arms Bill, and he should always find it very difficult to give coercion. Here they were offered a Constitution, but they could not be trusted with a gun. Was not this irrational and inconsistent? If they could not be trusted with arms, that was an argument against their being allowed Home Rule. What were the reasons for bringing in the Arms Bill? The Government had justified the Arms Bill not in view of the present condition of Ireland, but on account of what the condition of Ireland might be if this Bill was passed. What a comment was this on the Bill itself. They were told that if civil war arose from the passing of this Bill it would be unjustifiable; but it seemed to him that if the Governing Body were to break its part of the contract those who had entered into the contract with it would be released from performing their part. If the right hon. Gentleman feared the circumstances out of which it arose, he was right in bringing in that Arms Bill; but how serious was the position of affairs, and how grave was the position of the Government which brought it in. They had been told there would be civil war; but this he was not going to argue. The mere fact that the possibility of such a thing could be discussed to his mind condemned the measure which made it possible. The President of the Local Government Board Mr. Stansfeld the other night derided the idea of there being two nations in Ulster; but the hon. Member for Sligo had said that, at any rate, in Down and Antrim there were only Englishmen and Scotchmen. [Cries of "No!" Well, he did not want to look upon any body of his fellow-countrymen as foreigners, nor did he wish to look upon any laws which might be made by them as coming in a foreign garb; but he did protest against a Bill which dealt with them as the present measure proposed to do. Then, with regard to the safeguards in the Bill, they would be better out of it altogether, and simply for the reason that as long as there remained a single safeguard for the rights of the minorities in Ireland, so long they would place a blot on the Bill and an argument against it which they could never take away. What was the only kind of Assembly that ought to govern any country? Ought it not to be an Assembly which they could trust to deal out equal laws for everybody—to give to the rich man the same laws as were to be given to the poor man? Every single safeguard that was placed on the Bill was a confession that the Irish Legislature would not be a Body of that character. If such a degrading insinuation was placed on that Body, how could they expect that the Unionist minority should view its policy with any confidence? Now, he could not believe that this Bill would be a final settlement of the Irish Question. It fell far short of the views expressed by the Irish Members. It seemed to him that that was a difficult dilemma for the Government to get over. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. W. O'Brien) had been reported in his own newspaper as having said, in a speech made on the 23rd of August last year—

[Ninth Night.]

"When the complete programme of the Land League was accomplished, landlordism would vanish from the country, and the soil of Ireland would be free and its people with no master but the Almighty, and no friend but the green flag of the independent Irish nation."

There had been several other speeches made by Irish Members of a similar character, though some of them had been denied as being inaccurately reported. The words of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) as to the last link between England and Ireland had been reported in a verbatim report in The Irish World. The hon. Member for South Londonderry (Mr. T. M. Healy), speaking on April 20, a fortnight after that measure was introduced, was reported in The Freeman's Journal to have said—

"Let that Bill perish or let it succeed, the cause of Ireland would continue. The Irish race would pursue their mission, and would never cease until they had made their country a land free and glorious in the civilized world."

What was the mission of the Irish race there referred to? It was that the separation movement should go on until the green flag of Ireland floated over Dublin. That work was to be continued whether that Bill succeeded or not; and he asked whether, in the face of that statement from a distinguished Leader of the Party below the Gangway, the House could be deluded into expecting that Bill to be a final settlement of the Irish Question? The Government said if the Bill failed it could be repealed; but did hon. Gentlemen who were going to support the Bill think that after it became law it could be repealed by a simple Act of Parliament in that House? Would not the Irish people struggle hard to prevent its repeal? And though the struggle might be futile, still any Bill, the repeal of which would have to be carried out by force, the House surely ought to pause long before it passed. He confessed frankly that if he did believe it was to be a final settlement of the question—if he believed that by a measure of that kind they would ever attain a final settlement of the question—if he thought that the Bill would bring peace and prosperity to Ireland, to bring about a real union of affection and mutual interest between the two countries, to strengthen and not to impair the strength and integrity of the Empire, he declared solemnly that he would vote for it; but if he could not believe this—if he believed it would impair the strength and integrity of the Empire, that it would bring upon Ireland a long series of intestine disturbances, commotions, and troubles; that it would disturb the foundations of property, not of landed property, but in all securities—he appealed to hon. Members for Ireland whether he would not be false to his country if he voted in favour of the Bill? They would never get a final settlement of the Irish Question until they got a Bill which would deal out fair and equal justice to all persons alike in Ireland, and that the present Bill would not do. He did not share the views of those who said that there would be religious persecution if the Bill were passed; but he feared it might be the cause of religious intolerance and religious animosity being superadded to terrible political discussions, and if it passed into law there would come a day for many in Ireland and for many in this country when they would look back on the passing of the measure with grief. He felt himself bound to vote against the second reading.

Mr. MAGNIAC (Bedford, N., Biggleswade) said, he had been struck with the observation made by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) in his remarkable speech to the effect that at last the English people were beginning to learn the truth about Ireland. Some of the speeches which they had heard that night, and certainly some which they had heard yesterday and on Friday last, had shown that they had much to learn about that country. What they were now learning would, he hoped, reach the heart of the English people. He believed it would, although he confessed to some disappointment that more than one hon. Member on the other side of the House had frequently made the inquiry why that measure had been brought forward. There was, he thought, one reason, and a commanding reason, why it was brought forward. They had spent many long and anxious nights in the last Parliament in passing the Franchise Bill. That Franchise Bill was carried by great majorities, and its main object was to give electoral rights to the people of this country and also to the people of Scotland and of Ireland. If any confirmation were required as to the social change which had been effected by the passing of the Franchise Bill, he thought that the eloquent terms in which that change was described by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury Mr. A. Morley would leave no doubt in the mind of anyone as to what had occurred. There was a passage spoken by the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) which showed that he held the same opinion with regard to the magnitude of the change effected. He said—

“Parliament has granted to Ireland complete political freedom in Parliamentary election by the ballot and the extension of the franchise, and it is absolutely inconsistent with that complete political freedom to continue permanently the old practice of governing Ireland by a system of coercion.”

He thought this was a striking proof of the change which had been effected, and it constituted a sufficient answer to hon. Members who had asked why this Bill had been brought in. The Bill introduced by the Prime Minister was founded on the basis of free and representative institutions. That seemed to him to comprise a very large part, if not the whole, of the case. In dealing at some length with the financial part of the question, the hon. Member (Mr. A. Morley) showed that the present Expenditure in Ireland was £9,000,000. This amount was derived from money collected from the Irish taxpayers, £7,000,000; and from the English taxpayers, £2,000,000. The proposal of the Bill was that there should be expended in Ireland £6,000,000, instead of £9,000,000, the result being that there would be a flow of 1,000,000 Irish sovereigns from Ireland into England annually. He thought that this was a financial condition of affairs which might lead to grave trouble and grave commercial disaster. Besides this there would be withdrawals of an expenditure of £2,000,000 of English money, resulting in a difference of expenditure in Ireland of £3,000,000. It was impossible to believe that the withdrawal of such a sum as that from the currency of the country would not have a very serious effect on the Irish Revenue. It was further possible that the sum of £50,000,000, spoken of in reference to the Land Question, would in the long run reach £100,000,000. This would lead to an additional drain upon Ireland of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 for Interest and Sinking Fund, a charge which no country could stand. It would be equivalent to £1,200,000,000 or £1,300,000,000 National Debt in England, or a payment annually of £40,000,000 or £50,000,000. He thought one great advantage of the Bill would be that it would lead the English people to see at what an enormous cost they were governing, or misgoverning, Ireland, and he thought it would also show Ireland that there was no disposition to deal with her in a niggardly spirit. He did not believe the Irish Members were by any means irreconcilable. It had not been any more pleasant to them than to him to sit up all night; but, with arrangements for them to give more attention to Irish Business, the old obstruction would disappear, or it ought to be put down with the strong hand. If proper arrangements were not made for the conduct of Irish Business, the House of Commons had itself to blame. The Irish Members had no right to barter away the claim of those who might come after them to take part in the deliberations of the Imperial Parliament. Those who did not accept the Bill ought to ask what were the alternatives presented to them. That of Local Boards was not accepted as the required remedy. Then there was the alternative scheme of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham Mr. J. Chamberlain, which he had no hesitation in saying he did not understand. It had been put before them in so crude a manner that it was no shame to say that until they knew more about it they would have nothing to do with it. The Leader of the Tory Party (the Marquess of Salisbury) had also put forward a plan in these words—

“My alternative policy is that Parliament should enable the Government of England to govern Ireland.”

What they wanted was not that England should govern Ireland, but that Ireland should govern Ireland. The Marquess of Salisbury's was the most impossible scheme that had yet been put forward, for the only way of carrying it out would be for Parliament at once to repeal that part of the Franchise Act which related to Ireland. He did not think they were prepared to accept such a responsibility as that. He did not believe in any specific for Ireland. He believed they would have to work out the salvation of Ireland by much trouble and much labour; it could not be done by a stroke of the pen, nor by the passing of any measure in that House; but they would have to apply many minds and much thought and labour to the question. The Prime Minister had said that the history of Ireland was one long series of internal controversies. Two Parties were contending in Ireland, and it was their aim and desire to reconcile those differences. That was the task that was set before them, and that was the task to which the House had to apply itself. Hon. Members opposite asked what proof there was that anything was required to be done in Ireland. There was the agrarian difficulty arising from two causes, an artificial and a natural cause; there was the finance question and the representation of Ireland; and there was Ireland itself divided into two camps. Those were the difficulties which they had to deal with, and he was not aware that any other remedies had yet been applied but coercion and corruption. There was one alternative, and one only, which had not yet been tried, and that was to throw the responsibility for the government of Ireland upon Ireland itself. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham disliked the measure and the plan proposed by the Bill, though approving of the principle, and therefore proposed to vote against it. They had been told that they ought to prefer their country to their Party and vote against this Bill. That argument was a very old friend indeed; but he invariably found when it came to be examined that it was the Liberal Party which it was proposed to set aside. Believing that the Liberal Party and the welfare of his country were synonymous, he should disregard the advice and vote for the principle of the Bill—namely, self-government for Ireland in her domestic affairs, subject to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby: The thing that has struck me very much in the discussion on the general principle of this measure is, that the great mass of the opponents of the Bill attack those who have promoted it not so much because it is in itself inexpedient or inopportune, but because, in their view, to propose a separate Parliament for Ireland is a thing which is, in some sense or other, inconsistent with the principle of the British Constitution, that it is ruinous to this Empire, and that it is an idea which it is almost treason to entertain. A view of that kind coming from ignorant persons might perhaps be understood, but that anybody should advance such a view in this House is a thing which to me is entirely inexplicable. One would suppose that Ireland never had a separate Parliament of its own, to listen to the language we sometimes hear; but, in this House, those who have had to do with the construction of the edifice in which we are now collected have certainly taken pains to remind all those hon. Members of the history of our Parliamentary Institutions, their different features, and their gradual growth. In St. Stephen's Hall, leading up from the Halls of the Plantagenets to this Chamber, there are statues of the worthies who were the founders of the English Constitution. You see there the statues of Falkland, Clarendon, Chatham, Walpole, Pitt, and Fox; in the very vestibule of the building are two statues at the entrance to St. Stephen's Chapel which represent two illustrious Irish statesmen. One of them is Edmund Burke, and the other is Henry Grattan. Burke's work in English politics is known to all; but the fame of Henry Grattan rests upon one great work which he performed in Ireland and for Ireland, and the title of Grattan to this place in the Walhalla of the English Constitution rests upon the achievement of establishing a separate Parliament in Ireland, and upon his success in obtaining the consent of English statesmen and of the English Parliament to the Declaration of Irish Rights. Now, when we are told that to establish a separate Parliament in Ireland is something destructive of the British Constitution, let me remind the House what were the words of the Declaration of Rights as drawn by Grattan. They were—

“To assure His Majesty that by our fundamental laws and franchises—laws and franchises which we on the part of the nation do claim as her birthright—the subjects of this Kingdom cannot be bound, affected, or obliged by any legislation, save only by the King, Lords, and Commons of this His Majesty's realm of Ireland, nor is there any other body of men who have power or authority to make laws for the same. To assure His Majesty that His Majesty's subjects of Ireland conceive that in this privilege is contained the very essence of their liberty, and that they tender it as they do their lives, and have with one voice declared and protested against the interposition of any other Parliament in the legislation of this country."

It is upon that Declaration of Rights that the fame of Henry Grattan rests, and it is because of that Declaration of Rights that his statue stands in St. Stephen's Hall. Well, that was no new doctrine at that time. Grattan, by his genius and eloquence, established it, and gave Parliamentary effect to it; but it had been declared many years before by the greatest writer of the Tory Party, and the man who had the greatest influence, perhaps, until the time of Grattan, over the Irish people of any man among them—I mean Dean Swift. In a perfectly well-known passage in The Drapier Letters in that great controversy, in which Swift proved himself to be more than a match for Walpole, he says—

"It is true, indeed, that within the memory of man the Parliaments of England have sometimes assumed the power of binding this Kingdom by laws enacted there, wherein they were at first openly opposed—as far as truth, reason, and justice are capable of opposing—by the famous Mr. Molineux, an English gentleman born here, as well as by several of the greatest patriots and best Whigs in England; but the love and torrent of power prevailed. Indeed, the arguments on both sides were invincible. For, in reason, all government without the consent of the governed is the very definition of slavery; but, in fact, 11 men, well armed, will certainly subdue one single man in his shirt. But I have done: for those who have used to cramp liberty have gone so far as to resent even the liberty of complaining, although a man upon the rack was never known to be refused the liberty of roaring as loud as he thought fit."

That was the view of the great Tory writer of the last century. Well, now, when the Declaration of Rights was made by Grattan, how was it received in England? Was it received with the horror and indignation which now meets the claim for an Irish Parliament? I will endeavour to bring before the House how the matter was then dealt with. It arose at a very critical period in the history of the English Constitution. The liberties of Ireland were asserted at the moment when the liberties of America were established. It was part of that great controversy at a time certainly when the principles of the relations of the Mother Country to the Dependencies were as much discussed and as well understood as they were at any time, I suppose, of our Constitution. There were giants, it was said, in those days—great statesmen who discussed the principles upon which the Constitution rested, especially in regard to those relations; and certainly it might be said, in the words of a famous quotation of Pitt, that—"Liberty dawned upon Ireland from the West," for it was precisely at the time of the fall of the Administration of Lord North that the Declaration of Rights made by Grattan was accepted by the Parliament of England. Now, it is a very curious coincidence that at the time when Grattan made that Declaration of Rights a Tory Government was in power, and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was Lord Carlisle, a direct ancestor of my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and he wrote to the Secretary of State in England a despatch in these words—

"Your Lordships cannot be ignorant that the actual exercise of the authority of the British Parliament in Ireland was utterly and literally impracticable long before I arrived in that Kingdom. There was not a magistrate or Revenue officer there attached to or dependent on the British Government who could venture to enforce an English law. The attempt would have been madness, as it was certain to receive a great and decided resistance. There was not a jury in the Kingdom who would find a verdict under a British Act."

And again he writes—

"It is beyond a doubt that the practicability of governing Ireland by English laws is become utterly visionary. (That was in the old days of Protestant ascendancy. It is with me equally beyond a doubt that Ireland may be well and happily governed by its own laws. It is, however, by no means so clear that if the present moment is neglected, this country will not be driven into a state of confusion, the end of which no man can foresee or limit."

That was the language of the Tory Lord Lieutenant under the Government of Lord North in 1762, and I rather suspect, if we could see the secret despatches of last year, we should find that not very different language was held by the last Tory Lord Lieutenant. I have challenged right hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to the expression of opinion of Lord Carnarvon, and we have never had that expression of opinion given to us. Well, there is another very curious thing about the establishment of the independent Parliament of Ireland. The Irish Secretary at that time was a man of great ability, but rather a shifty politician—Mr. Eden, afterwards Lord Auckland — hurried over to England, just as the new Administration was being formed, in order that he might anticipate that Administration by declaring in favour of the policy of Grattan. He came to the British Parliament, in post haste, to propose the Repeal of the Act of George I. Well, Sir, the Government was formed; the Duke of Portland — and the noble Marquess will have respect for his memory and authority, for he also was, later on, the Leader of a Whig secession — went over to Ireland, and from there he wrote thus —

“If you delay or refuse, the Liberal Government cannot exist here in its present form, and the sooner you recall your Lieutenant and renounce all claim to the country, the better. But, on the contrary, if you can bring your minds to concede largely and handsomely, I am persuaded you may make any use of this people, or anything that they are worth, that you can want.”

Oh, what “fools and cowards and traitors” were the statesmen of those days! Referring to the advice of the Whig Lord Lieutenant on that subject, Fox said —

“Unwilling subjects are little better than enemies; it would be better not to have subjects at all than to have such as would be continually on the watch to seize the opportunity of making themselves free. If this country should attempt to coerce Ireland, and succeed in the attempt, the consequence would be that at the breaking out of any war with any foreign Power the first step must be to send troops over to secure Ireland, instead of calling upon her to give a willing support to the common cause.”

Has not that been the case with Ireland ever since the Union? [“No, no!”] All I can say is, that if I have read history aright, it has been the case since the Union to an extent which was not the case before. I will give you some facts — I am coming to that. This, then, was the view that was taken of the state of Ireland by those statesmen; and when people are told not to be intimidated, I would say that there were then hundreds and thousands of Volunteers, mostly Protestants, with arms in their hands. How did the British Parliament, directed by the Tory Lord Lieutenant and the Whig Lord Lieutenant, receive the Declaration of Rights made by Grattan? How did George III., who was not regarded generally as a coward, or a fool, or a traitor, receive it? He directed the Whig Lord Lieutenant (the Duke of Portland) to answer the Declaration of Rights made by Grattan, and these are the words of the Duke of Portland on the subject —

“By the magnanimity of the King and the wisdom of the Parliament of Great Britain, I have to assure you that immediate attention has been paid to your representations. These benevolent intentions of His Majesty, and the willingness of his Parliament of Great Britain to second his gracious purposes, are unaccompanied by any stipulation or condition whatever.”

So, by the unanimous voice of both Parties in the State, that Declaration of Grattan was accepted and acted upon. Now, what was done upon it? The Act which restrained the liberties of the Parliament of Ireland was the Act of George I.; and let me remind the House what was that Parliamentary record. It was —

“That the said Kingdom of Ireland hath been, and is of right and ought to be, subordinate unto and dependent upon the Imperial Crown of Great Britain, as being inseparably united and annexed thereto, and that the King's Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, hath of right, and ought to have, full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the two Kingdoms and the Kingdom of Ireland.”

That was the Statute of George I. But what did Parliament do in the year 1782 with that Statute? They repealed it, and they substituted for it this Declaration —

“That the said right claimed by the people of Ireland, to be bound only by laws enacted by His Majesty and the Parliament of that Kingdom in all cases whatever, shall be, and it is hereby declared to be, established and ascertained for ever, and shall at no time hereafter be questioned or questionable.”

That Declaration is as explicit, and declared itself to be as final, as any declaration to be found in the Act of Union itself. Well, Sir, but I said it was unanimous. Well, it was very nearly unanimous. There was not a voice raised against it. There was not a vote given against it, either in the House of Commons, or in the House of Lords. But I am wrong in saying it was absolutely unanimous. There was one person whose mind was disturbed, and it was disturbed on the question of the supremacy of Parliament. That was a great Prerogative lawyer (Lord Loughborough) — the man who made the memorable attack upon Franklin in the Privy Council. This Perogative lawyer was somewhat disturbed as to the effect which Grattan's Parliament might have upon the supremacy of the English Legislature. But there was a lawyer in those days who declined to argue questions of this kind upon demurrer, who looked at the great political aspects of the question, and that was the great legal adviser and light of the Whig Party, Lord Camden; and in answer to the technical argument on the supremacy of the English Parliament in the House of Lords, Lord Camden said—

"The possession of a right never to be asserted was, in his opinion, of no value to any man or any State. Why, then, should the learned Lord object to the repeal of an Act declaring such an empty right? Would the learned Lord say distinctly what he meant to grant to Ireland?"

That is a question which, I think, I might address to some of my legal Friends. Lord Camden continues—

"How far would he resist their claims? If not, to object to what was proposed without marking out any line of conduct was no satisfactory information to the House, nor agreeable to the learned Lord's understanding, which was by no means indecisive."

If I may venture to borrow the language of Lord Camden, I may address that question to my learned Friends who are so much disturbed and exercised on the subject of the supremacy. Now, we have had an appeal to the wisdom of our forefathers. They have appealed to Cæsar; let them go to Cæsar. I have endeavoured to lay before the House what was the view of the wisdom of our forefathers on this question. Do you think that records of that description can be erased and forgotten as if they had never been? Do you suppose it is not the recollection of these things which live in the memory of the Irish nation, and that they look back to them, and have looked back to them, for generations, as the Jews by the waters of Babylon looked back to the times when they were better off? It may be, and has been, said—"Oh, but Grattan's Parliament, which was then established, was a mistake; it did not answer; the arrangements which were then made broke down altogether." And here I come to a point at which the noble Lord Lord George Hamilton seemed to challenge what I said just now. I said at that time that Ireland, under the Parliament of Grattan, had become a source of strength, and not of weakness, to the Empire, as it had been before. There is very remarkable testimony upon this point. The noble Lord the Member for East Leicestershire Lord John Manners made, the other night, an attack, which I believed to be quite unfounded, on the history of Grattan's Parliament. He said that that Parliament had totally failed. Now, Mr. Burke, who knew something of the question, and who had always been, and was in 1782, an enthusiastic supporter of the independence of the Irish Parliament, towards the close of his days, when he had become a Whig seceder, bore his testimony to the success of the Irish Parliament. In one of his letters, when he was invoking and stimulating Pitt to continue the Great War, and pointing out the great resources that England possessed at that time for carrying on the war, he contrasted the condition of Ireland then with the condition of Ireland as it had been at former periods during the great wars of Marlborough. And this is what Burke says in his letter on "A Reticent Peace" in the year 1796, when Grattan's Parliament had been in operation for 14 years—

"Ireland, now so large a source of the common opulence and power, and which wisely managed might be made much more beneficial and much more effective, was then the heaviest of burdens. An army not much less than 10,000 men was drawn from the general effort to keep that Kingdom in a poor, unfruitful, and resourceless subjection."

Mr. Lecky, who is an historical authority, and is now a member of the Patriotic Union, wrote a few years ago that, at that time, the whole military establishment of Ireland was 12,000 men, and that in the event of a foreign war it would have been possible to have withdrawn a considerable portion of that force for the general defence of the Empire, there being no serious or general disaffection prevailing among the Irish people. I am not quite sure that he is speaking there of the exact period of Grattan's Parliament, but, at all events, he is speaking of Ireland before the Union. Could that be said of Ireland at any time since the Union? Is there any time since the Union of which you could say that the whole military establishment of Ireland was 12,000 men, and that in the event of war it would have been possible to have withdrawn a considerable portion of them?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): Under Lord Beaconsfield's Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The noble Lord says "under Lord Beaconsfield's Government," a Government which closed its reign in Ireland by the declaration that Ireland was in a state of veiled rebellion. We all recollect very well the letter which was addressed to the Duke of Marlborough. We all know what was the cause of the Rebellion of 1798—it was the extraordinary and abominably bad faith which was shown to the Irish people. Our pledges then made to the Catholics were not fulfilled, and it was that which brought about the state of things which ended in the Rebellion, and the Rebellion brought about the attempt to establish the Union. If I am not detaining the House too long, I should like to read a sentence or two of what Mr. Lecky says about the Union. He says—

"Theorists may argue that it would be better for Ireland to become in every respect a mere Province of England. They may contend that a union of Legislature, accompanied by a corresponding fusion of characters and identification of hopes, interests, and desires, would strengthen the Empire; but, as a matter of fact, this was not what was effected in 1800. The measure of Pitt centralized, but it did not unite, or rather by uniting the Legislatures it divided the nations. In a country where the sentiment of nationality was as intense as in any part of Europe it destroyed the National Legislature contrary to the manifest wish of the people, and by means so corrupt, treacherous, and shameful that they are never likely to be forgotten. . . . More than 70 years have passed since the boasted measure of Pitt, and it is unfortunately incontestable that the lower orders in Ireland are as hostile to the system of government under which they live as the Hungarian people have ever been to Austrian or the Roman people to Papal rule; that Irish disloyalty is multiplying enemies of England wherever the English tongue is spoken; and that the national sentiment runs so strongly that multitudes of Irish Catholics look back with deep affection to the Irish Parliament, although no Catholic could sit within its walls, and although it was only during the last seven years of its independent existence that Catholics could vote for its Members. Among the opponents of the Union were many of the most loyal as well as nearly all the ablest men in Ireland; and Lord Charlemont, who died shortly before the measure was consummated, summed up the feelings of many in the emphatic sentence with which he protested against it. 'It would more than any other measure,' he said, 'contribute to the separation of the two countries, the perpetual connection of which is one of the warmest wishes of my heart.' In fact, the Union of 1800 was not only a great crime, but was also, like most crimes, a great blunder. The manner in which it was carried was not only morally scandalous, it also entirely vitiated it as a work of statesmanship. . . . Carried as it was prematurely, in defiance of the national sentiment of the people, and of the protests of the unbribed talent of the country, it has deranged the whole course of political development, driven a large portion of the people into sullen disloyalty, and almost destroyed healthy public opinion."

Well, Sir, I do not subscribe to the view that Mr. Lecky takes of the conduct of Pitt in that matter. He thinks that Mr. Pitt deliberately brought about, as I understand it, the Rebellion by refusing the rights of the Catholics, and that he refused reform because he wanted to carry the Union. However, I will not enter into that controversy; but the question is, was the statement true? Has the condition of things between England and Ireland been better since the Union than before? I confess, as far as I can judge from observation and reading, it seems to me to have become worse and to be growing worse every day. If that be so, what are the objections to reverting to a policy not identical, but in many respects similar, to that which our ancestors adopted under similar circumstances, which I have tried to depict? It is said—"Oh, but if you give Ireland a Parliament you will destroy the unity of the Empire." Well, Ireland had a Parliament, an independent Parliament, far more independent than any proposed in this Bill. Was there, then, no unity in the British Empire during the great Administration of Mr. Pitt from 1782 to 1800, a period of which the Tory Party are more proud than of any period of their political history? Is there no unity of the Empire now in relation to the Colonies? My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) says the Colonies are absolutely independent; but are we not talking about the "unity of an Empire" of which the Colonies are most important portions? Therefore, to say that the establishment of an independent Parliament affects the question of the unity of the Empire, is, I venture to say, to use phrases which are inappropriate. But there is another objection—the objection as to the supremacy of Parliament. That is a different thing altogether from the unity of the Empire; and it is said that the establishment of a separate Parliament necessarily affects the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Why, of course, it does. If you delegate part of your authority to another person, you do, to a certain degree, reduce your own authority. Now, on this subject of the supremacy of Parliament, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury Sir Henry James asserted this proposition, that if you establish a Parliament for any purpose or to any extent with an independent authority of its own, the country becomes a foreign country; and, having challenged me to agree to that proposition, I asked him a question to which he did not give an answer—Was Ireland a foreign country under Grattan's Parliament? Now, that is a test question. My right hon. and learned Friend never attempted to answer it; but he escaped the urgency of my question by taking refuge in a resource at which I was astonished. He quoted an anonymous writer; and he thought under cover of the authority of an anonymous writer to establish his position. Now, I have no objection to my right hon. and learned Friend studying anonymous writers; there are some anonymous writers for whom I have a great respect. But I would recommend my right hon. and learned Friend, if he takes to studying anonymous writers, to take the pains to read their letters, and not to satisfy himself with single sentences which he may pick up out of the pages of a text-book. With some trouble I obtained a copy of the letter of the anonymous writer to whom my right hon. and learned Friend alluded, and, to my great edification and satisfaction, I found that, by a singular prescience of anticipation, that anonymous writer had laid down the very principles of this Bill as the proper principles that ought to govern the relations of Imperial and subordinate Parliaments. I would not have referred to it unless my right hon. and learned Friend had challenged me; but it appears that the letter was written with reference to the question of the right of the Imperial Parliament to deal with matters in Canada, and it arose out of the Merchant Shipping Act. There were persons ignorant enough to assert that the Imperial Parliament could not legislate with reference to merchant shipping in Canada, and this letter seems to have been written to discuss the question of the relations of the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion Parliament. It said—

"The whole question of the relations of the Imperial authority to the Representative Colonies is one of great delicacy. It requires consummate prudence and statesmanship to reconcile the Metropolitan supremacy with the worthy spirit of Colonial independence. As a matter of abstract right, the Mother Country has never parted with the claim to supreme authority of the Imperial Legislature. If it did so, it would dissolve the Imperial tie and convert the Colonies into foreign and independent States. The principle on which the Mother Country has acted has been to concede, in the largest measure, local independence, and to assert its authority only when Imperial interests are substantially involved. To this principle the Colonies have cheerfully adhered. In all matters in which the Imperial Legislature does not expressly, or by necessary implication, interfere, the Colonial Legislature is independent. The principle, as I understand it, is this—the Constitutional supremacy of the Imperial Legislature is of right universal, but in practice it is never exercised in local as distinguished from Imperial interests, or in any case where its application would not be generally recognized as just and reasonable. What those cases are must be determined by practical statesmanship. The real problem of politics is to distinguish between that which you have a right to do and that which it is right you should do."

I do not know that if I were to endeavour to explain what I understood to be the doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament, as laid down in this Bill, I should do it in different words from those which I have quoted. The situation with reference to the Colonies and that with reference to Ireland, according to this Bill, are really the same, although the end is attained in a different way. In the case of the Colonies, there is in the Act of 1865 an express reservation of universal power; but, as is pointed out in the passage to which I have referred, that power is not, and ought not, to be exercised in the matters of local interest which have been conceded to the Colony. The proper phrase to employ is, that it would be unconstitutional to exercise such a power. Now, by this Bill the power of the Imperial Parliament is not taken away. It is nowhere taken away. But there is given in local affairs a concurrent right to the Irish Parliament; and there, again, I say it would be most unconstitutional for the English Parliament to interfere with that concurrent right. But this Bill does what is not done in the case of the Colonies,

it specifies particularly the Imperial matters on which the Imperial Parliament has an exclusive authority. That is what I have to say in answer to the challenge of my right hon. and learned Friend. But I must call attention to the most extraordinary statement made to-night by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He says—and this is the head and front of our offending—

“Your Bill impairs, if it does not destroy, the supremacy of Parliament.”

He says—

“What I contend for is that there shall be a Parliament which shall be supreme in every particular over the Parliament of Ireland.”

And he explained that he meant not merely supremacy of right, but a supremacy that would be habitually exercised. Well, if that is so, what is the use of having any Parliament at all? It would be merely establishing a squabble. If you are to have one Parliament constantly exercised in fighting another Parliament on the same matters, you had better have no such Parliament at all. And, therefore, how he can say he is in favour of the principle of this Bill I cannot understand. Amongst his plans—he has many, but they do not last long, they inevitably disappear—is federalism. But he shrinks from federalism, because he has pointed out that terrible consequences would ensue, for it would endanger the House of Lords, and might destroy the Monarchy. But to-night he has a new plan. He is not going to the country on the principle of this Bill, he is going on the method. That is the great issue before the country; not whether there is to be an Irish Parliament; not whether there is to be Home Rule—that is the principle of the Bill, and he agrees with that—but he is going to the country, because he does not believe we have adopted the proper method. He says that the proper method ought to be to rely on the Canadian example—the relation not of the Dominion Parliament to the Imperial Parliament, but of the Dominion Parliament of Canada to the Provincial Parliaments of Canada. That is his last plan. What are these relations? Is the Dominion Parliament of Canada supreme over all affairs? [“No!”] Most distinctly it is not. In the 91st section of the Canadian Act you will find the exclusive powers of the Dominion Parliament, and in the next section the exclusive powers of the Provincial Parliaments. But that is not all. What are the matters as to which the powers are exclusive? The Provincial Parliaments have, in the first place, authority to amend the constitution of the Provinces. This is the brand new plan of my right hon. Friend which we are to adopt. What is the next thing upon which the Provincial Parliaments are to be our model? The Provincial Legislature—

“Shall have exclusive authority over direct taxation within the Province, the establishments, and tenure of Provincial offices,”

—that is to say, command of the Executive; but this is not all—hear this, men of Ulster, and tremble—

“and over the property and civil rights in the Province.”

These are the exclusive rights of these Parliaments which my right hon. Friend suggests as the model for the Irish Parliament. But even that is not all. There is another exclusive right which my right hon. Friend's plan will give to the Parliament of Ireland. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) is here, but I believe he is a great advocate for the rejection of the second reading, on the ground of the interference by this Bill with the administration of justice in Ireland; and it may interest him to learn that the Provincial Parliament, which is to be the model for the Irish Parliament, has exclusive authority over—

“The administration of justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction.”

This is the plan with which my right hon. Friend is going to destroy the Government. This is his last patent plan.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland : His second last.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Then, my right hon. Friend insisted very much on the power which he said the Dominion Parliament had of making all the laws of the various Provinces the same—of assimilating the laws of the various Provinces.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): No.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Then I withdraw that; but there is such a power given to the Dominion Parliament to assimilate the law of the various Provinces. It is not unnatural that such a power should be possessed by the supreme Parliament. But under what conditions is the power given?—

“That any Act of Parliament of Canada making provision for such uniformity shall not have effect in any Province unless and until it is adopted and enacted into law by the Legislature.”

All I can say is that our plan leaves the Parliament at Westminster much more supreme than it would be according to the plan of my right hon. Friend. Then there is the great question of the protection of minorities. I confess I am a little astonished at the quarter from which that claim for protection comes. When the Union took place, what protection was there for the Catholic majority in Ireland? What protection was there for the men who had to wait a whole generation before securing their civil rights? From Grattan's Parliament they had some chance; but when that was abolished, and they were left at the mercy of the Protestant Parliament at Westminster, what protection were they given? There was no attempt made at all to protect them. Then we are told that if we do not take care we shall have war made upon us by the Orangemen. Well, I am not disposed myself to take these things very seriously. I do not think they will frighten sensible men; and I thought that the hon. Member for Sligo Mr. Sexton treated that matter this evening very much as it deserved. If we are going to have the Oriflamme raised in Ballykilbeg, and if the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Major Saunderson) is going to assail us with bombs, and if, as I think the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington Lord Randolph Churchill, when challenged, said that he would do, he is going to render his personal assistance, then, of course, that makes the thing very formidable. But if we are to have terrible dangers of this description, I think we must invoke the melodramatic valour of my right hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh Mr. Goschen,—we must send for our family solicitor, and make our wills and do our duty. We have heard a great deal about menaces on this occasion; but the menaces come, I think, from the loyal and patriotic minority. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh says that if Russia had corrupted a certain amount of Members of this House to get a Bill passed, and the Bill was passed by a majority consisting of the men so bribed, would we not be justified in employing all the powers we possess to resist such a measure? Will the Orange Members apply that doctrine to the Act of Union? If resistance is justified under these circumstances, there is no insurrection and no rebellion that has taken place in Ireland in this century which, according to the doctrine of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, was not entirely justifiable. If, again, the doctrine contended for by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington be true, that if an Act establishing an independent Parliament in Ireland may be properly resisted by force by the minority, I want to know is not that a justification for resistance; is it not an entire justification for the majority in Ireland against the Act of Union? I do not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) is here; but this is what the Mr. Plunket of that period said—

“I say, circumstanced as you are, pass this Act and it will be a mere nullity, and no man in Ireland will be bound to obey it. I make this assertion deliberately; I repeat it, and I call upon anyone to take down my words. Yourself you can extinguish, but Parliament you cannot extinguish, it is enthroned in the hearts of the Irish people and enshrined in the Constitution.”

That is a statement in regard to the doing away with an independent Parliament at that time. And there was a great Tory lawyer, Mr. Saurin, who said that if that “Legislative Union should be forced upon the country against the will of its inhabitants it would be a nullity, and resistance to it would be a struggle against usurpation—not a resistance against law.”

Well, he held the doctrine of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. He said—

“You may make it binding as a law, but you cannot make it obligatory on conscience. It will be obeyed as long as England is strong; but resistance to it will be a duty, and the exhibition of that resistance will be a mere question of prudence."

You will thus see that two can play at that game; and if one set of men are to use this kind of language another set would be equally entitled to use it; but, in my opinion, it is equally unjustifiable whichever side may employ it. I say, then, that, so far as I can observe, the Act of Union has not united the two people. We propose a plan falling far short of Grattan's Parliament—a plan which we believe will satisfy the aspirations and the national demands of the Irish people, and we have reason to think so. Well, that is a policy of conciliation to Ireland. Now, I ask what other policy is there? I do not ask my right hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh, because I do not remember that within the last 10 years he has ever supported any policy of the Liberal Party, or that at a critical moment he has ever failed to give a Tory vote. And therefore he is acting in his right and according to his custom on this question. I do not ask my right hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs, because he says that a very little alteration in the Bill would make it suit him; and, therefore, he entreats everybody to vote against its second reading. We asked before for a plan, and we have now got a plan—a plan from a very important quarter—namely, from the regular Opposition. My right hon. Friend at the head of the Government said, a few weeks ago, that his plan had many enemies, but had no rival. But, Sir, it has a rival now, and it is between these two rival plans that the people of this country will be called upon to decide. What is that plan? Lord Salisbury defined it perfectly accurately in his speech to the Union of Conservative Associations. He said—"Our policy to-day is the traditional policy of the Tory Party." That is the policy which my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale and my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham are going to support. We know what is the traditional policy of the Tory Party towards Ireland. The sacred traditions of the Liberal Party—above all, those of the Whig Party—have been to oppose the traditional policy of the Tory Party towards Ireland. Our policy is, no doubt, a policy of confidence in the Irish nation. [Laughter.] Oh, yes, you laugh; and it is because you adopt the opposite policy that we take issue with you. Now, let us hear what is Lord Salisbury's definition. I say our policy is a policy of confidence in the Irish nation. The policy of Lord Salisbury is a policy of defiance and distrust. As Lord Salisbury seems to complain very much that his sentiments are misrepresented, I will be careful to quote his actual words. He says—

Sir William Harcourt

"We are asked to have confidence in the Irish people. Confidence depends upon the people in whom you are to confide. You would not confide representative institutions to Hot-tentots."

That is a pleasant conciliatory style of language, which is likely to remove the irritation and the troubles of Ireland! Depend upon it, Sir, it is this insolent spirit which makes British rule hated in Ireland, which makes the Irish people ungovernable; and no people with any spirit could be governed in a spirit of this kind. But let us go on. Lord Salisbury said—

"When you come to narrow it down, you will find that what is called self-government, but what is really government by the majority, works admirably when it is confided to a people of the Teutonic race, but that it does not work so well when people of other races are called upon to join them."

Self-government, then, is the exclusive privilege of the Teutonic race. If that is so, the reason given by the noble Marquess is an eternal and ineradicable incapacity on the part of the Irish people for self-government. Now, having tabooed the Irish people on the ground of their race, Lord Salisbury goes on to the question of religion. He says—

"In Ireland, owing to the character of the people and the history of the country, the Roman Catholics have been singularly exposed to the temptation to misuse for political purposes an organization meant for high spiritual ends."

I think I know, in this country, too, an organization meant for high spiritual ends which is greatly misused for political purposes. Well, then, he goes on—

"Your confidence is seriously diminished, because this tremendous, this grievously misused weapon, the Catholic Church, is in the hands of their opponents."

That is, the opponents of the minority. So we are not to give self-government to the Irish because they are not Teu-trunk, and we are not to give self government to Ireland because the majority of Irishmen are Roman Catholics. That is the traditional policy of the Tory Party. That is the rival policy, and it is well the country should know it. I am delighted—no, I am not delighted, I am sorry—that the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) adopts these principles of hatred of race. But he is a young man, and I hope he will live to improve the Tory Party. Let me go on to Lord Salisbury's panacea for the conciliation of Ireland. He says—

"Covering all these considerations, there is one ground why, for this purpose, I can never advise my countrymen to place confidence in the inhabitants of Ireland. That is, because they are a deeply divided people, and confidence is only fitly reposed upon a homogeneous people."

That is an astounding doctrine—that where people are divided they are not fit for representative institutions. I should have thought that, on matters of religion, people in this country are at least as much divided as people in Ireland. These, then, are the disqualifications for representative institutions, and therefore, says Lord Salisbury, advising the Conservative organizations—

"Repel with indignation and contempt anyone who asks, because we have confided in the British people, that therefore we should confide in a people who differ from them in every respect, who differ from them above all in this—that they are deeply divided among themselves."

Therefore this doctrine of indignation and contempt allows no confidence to be placed in a people because they differ from you in race and religion. That is the traditional policy of the Tory Party. Well, but what is the result of such a policy as that? It must be eternal and unquenchable hatred. No people can accept the government of any race upon terms such as these, expressed in language of contumelious insult. Then Lord Salisbury says—

"My alternative policy is, that the Government of England should be enabled to govern Ireland. Apply that recipe honestly, consistently, and resolutely for 20 years."

We are asked for a policy of finality; this is a policy of 20 years, a sort of 20 years' penal servitude, which is expected to reform the culprit, and then, after 20 years of Lord Salisbury's plank bed—

possibly a ticket of leave at the end of that time—

"you will find that Ireland will be fit to accept any gifts in the way of local government"

—they are not to have local government for 20 years—

"and any repeal of the Coercion Laws you may think fit to give them."

Well, you have applied that "tradition" for four times 20 years since the Union, and what good have you done? Is Ireland now fit, in the opinion of Lord Salisbury, to receive local self-government, or the repeal of the Coercion Laws? Lord Salisbury had a perfect right to appeal to the Tory Party in defence and support of such principles as these; but how can the Liberal Party be appealed to to support principles which are foreign to everything they profess, and to everything they have done? I should have thought that even the right hon. Member for East Edinburgh would have shrunk from a policy founded upon disqualifications of race and of religion. Is the noble Marquess the Member for Rosendale, in the name of Whig principles, going to support, either from the inside or from the outside, this policy? We are accustomed to new forms of Radicalism; but is the new Radicalism of Birmingham founded upon disqualifications of race and of religion? Next to the policy of Lord Salisbury, the most important thing to know is, what is the view of my noble Friend the Member for Rosendale? He went two days after this speech was made—after this declaration of war upon Ireland, for I can call it nothing else, from Lord Salisbury—he went to Bradford to make, as he always does make, a most able and effective speech; but in that speech there was not a single word of disclaimer of those principles, which declaration followed almost immediately after he had stood side by side with Lord Salisbury upon the platform of the Opera House. We have a right to know from the noble Lord and those who act with him whether these are the principles of the Whig Party? At Bradford my noble Friend criticized our Bill; he said very little of his own views, and it is a remarkable circumstance, considering the manner in which they have been acting closed. Sir, there was a desire, a week ago, on the part of the opponents of the Bill, that the debate should be closed. I appeal to the House whether it would have been fair to the country, in the emergency in which this question was found, that it should have been left in the dark as to the discussion which has been going on during the past week; and now I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman that he should at least give us until Monday in next week, in order that the question may be fairly thrashed out. We have been given to understand that very shortly we shall go before the constituencies. Surely, Sir, nothing can be more fitting than that this question should be fully stated from all sides and in all particulars by Members of Parliament before they go to the constituencies, in order that the country should be well advised and well informed upon the merits of this great controversy. I venture, with some confidence, to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister not unduly to close this debate, but to give further opportunities to hon. Members on this side of the House, as well as to the Members of the Opposition and Nationalist Party, who have a disposition to make still further contributions to the discussion.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Before the right hon. Gentleman gives any pledge as the closing of the debate, I also wish to make an appeal to him, on behalf of myself and other Radicals who have not yet been heard, and who do want to express our views on this Bill—views which we believe have the sanction of the constituencies of the country—not to close the debate until we have been heard.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): As the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has stated that few Members of the Front Opposition Bench—[MR. PARNELL: Prominent Members.]—that few prominent Members of the Front Opposition Bench have spoken, and that, at the last moment, a considerable number of other Members who wish to speak may be crushed out by the prominent Members of the Front Opposition Bench, I wish to observe that three Members of the late Cabinet, the Attorney General of the late Government, and two other Members of the late Government, making six in all, have spoken. I believe that, although they may not be, in the opinion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, prominent Members, that is a considerable contribution numerically from any one quarter of the House. So far as the prolongation of the debate is concerned, we on this side of the House are tolerably satisfied with the expression of opinion which has already been made; and I believe I may say that, with the exception of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who may wish to address the House, there is no likelihood of the debate being unduly prolonged by any other Member on this side of the House addressing the House. Under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork will see there is no likelihood of any prominent Member of his Party being precluded from addressing the House by the action of the Members of the Front Opposition Bench.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE) (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): It was unfortunate that last week this question of the prolongation of the debate came to be mixed up with different controversial matter. I think that, to a considerable extent, that controversial matter has now passed out of view; and I believe, as far as I am aware, that the Representatives of the different sections of the House who usually communicate upon subjects of this kind have addressed themselves to the consideration of the question without any reference to motive in the prolongation of the debate. I am glad of that. Now, Sir, it is only a very limited share that the Government can take in attempting to regulate the length of a debate of this description; plainly, we must have regard to the number of factions and sections into which the House is divided upon this subject. As I stated on a former occasion, we cannot undertake to exercise too great pressure. As far as the Government are concerned, we should be extremely well pleased if the debate could terminate on Friday night; that is what we should prefer; but I cannot undertake to say more. I cannot venture to interfere with the liberties of Members of the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

JURORS' DETENTION BILL.—[Bill 202.](Mr. Lockwood, Mr. Crompton, Mr. Finlay, Mr. Baggallay.)CONSIDERATION.Bill, as amended, *considered.Preamble.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Londonderry, S.): This is a very excellent Bill, and I do not see why it should not apply to Ireland. Therefore, I propose to amend the Preamble by leaving out "and Wales," in order to insert "Wales and Ireland."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 3, to leave out "and Wales," in order to insert "and Ireland." — (Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MOTION.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE — ASCENSION DAY — COMMITTEES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Committees shall not sit To-morrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House." — (Mr. John Morley.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, that, having opposed the Motion for the Adjournment of the House over the Derby Day, he felt bound to oppose the present Motion, although on slightly different grounds. He had opposed the Motion for Adjournment over the Derby Day on the ground that it was a bad thing to encourage the gambling that took place on that occasion. He was not going to say that he thought that it was a bad thing to go to church on Ascension Day. If any

hon. Member wanted to go to church on Ascension Day he had not the slightest objection; but he opposed the Motion on the ground that he believed that nobody wanted to go to church on Ascension Day. ["Oh, oh!"] He repeated that he believed there was no considerable number of Members who wanted to go to church to-morrow. Being a Presbyterian, he knew nothing about these Saints' days. If, however, any considerable number of hon. Members really wanted to go to church to-morrow, although he thought it was rather hard on the Business of the House that it should be postponed, he would be willing to withdraw his objection. If not, he thought it extremely undesirable that the Business of the House should be delayed. There was still important Business before the Committees, and, as the time was short, some of the Bills might be lost if the Motion were agreed to. If the Committees did not meet until 2 o'clock, he was quite sure, considering the absorbing interest centred in the debate to be resumed to-morrow, that hon. Members would not be got to sit after 4 o'clock; and therefore, under those circumstances, he must oppose the Motion.

Question put.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 13.]

(Mr. Dillon, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. Chance, Mr. Timothy Healy, Mr. Harrington, Mr. Small.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the measure was a very simple one, and he ventured to hope that it would recommend itself to the common sense of the House. He would not occupy much of their time in discussing the subject, and did not propose going into the details of the Bill, which were necessarily somewhat technical. It had always seemed to him that the object of a Registration Bill ought to be—first, to facilitate the placing on the list of everyone who had a right to be on it; secondly, to do that with the least possible expense and trouble; and, thirdly, to do it in such a way, as far as possible by an Act of that House, as to leave as few loopholes as possible for the ingenuity of lawyers and their agents to defeat the object of the Legislature. The Bill was one drafted on the experience gained at the last Registration Sessions. The details could only be understood by men who had attended the Courts, and had watched the difficulties which arose, owing to the interpretation of the various Acts of Parliament. Therefore, as he had said, he would not trouble the House by a lengthened discussion of the details; but there was one clause to which he must refer, as it, perhaps, might be considered by some hon. Members to be in the nature of a revolutionary one—namely, that the payment of rates should not be necessarily a preliminary for securing the vote. The payment of rates and the exercise of a vote were two separate and distinct things, absolutely apart; and he had always held and believed that the joining of them together was a radical mistake from the outset. The rate collectors should be given every power—and they had ample power—to collect the rates; but what could be the object of joining these two things together, which had no natural connection? In his opinion, the object was—at least it worked that way—to deprive the voter of his vote; and this system of connecting the payment of rates with the object of obtaining the franchise had worked as an obstruction to the payment of the rates. In a district that he took an interest in—Strabane—the Board of Guardians, where the rates notoriously might have been collected as the sitting of the Revision Courts were coming on, carried a motion, granting to the rate collectors a very extended period to collect the rates, with no object but to secure that the rates be not collected in time; for, of course, they would not collect until the last moment, and people would not pay until the last moment. Thus, instead of facilitating the payment of the rates, the existing system had exactly the opposite effect; and it was a public scandal that any part of an Act of Parliament should be used with a view to trick people entitled to the franchise out of their just rights. It had done no good, and had resulted in an enormous amount of legal chicanery. The two things, the payment of rates and the franchise, should be kept separate, and the result would be that the rates would be better collected, instead of being unfavourably affected. He was sure, in conclusion, that the Bill would recommend itself to the favour of the House. He would, therefore, move the second reading, and hoped the House would accept the measure.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork), in seconding the Motion, said, there were one or two provisions in the Bill which were more or less of a technical character, which he, as one who had had some experience of Registration and Revision Courts, might venture to give an explanation of. The Bill did not lay down any new electoral principle. It did not propose to lay down any fresh extension of the Parliamentary franchise to any new class. Experience had shown that the existing law had failed to remove a number of defects and technicalities, and he would urge that no man should be deprived of the franchise on account of any difficulty in the law. Now, he maintained—and he believed hon. Members in all quarters of the House would agree with him—that the present state of the law was absurd as regarded the period of qualification. The various Reform and Registration Acts provided, and very properly provided, that no mere visitor to a constituency should vote in that constituency. That was a perfectly just and perfectly reasonable condition of things. He would, however, point out that a voter who qualified a week before the revision of July of this year would not be entitled to exercise the franchise for about two years and a-half. He desired to call attention to the fact that, while it was desirable to prevent mere casual visitors to a constituency from voting, the present Act went far beyond what was required in that direction. He therefore thought that the reduction of the period of qualification from 12 months to six months was a most reasonable provision in the Bill. The clause abolishing the necessity for payment of rates had been described as a "revolutionary proposal;" but he believed that he could show that it was not such a revolutionary proposal as it looked. There was already no necessity for the payment of rates by leaseholders or freemen under certain conditions. The Bill, therefore, he contended, so far from being a revolutionary proposal, merely attempted to directly effect what Parliament had been endeavouring to do for the past 10 or 11 years indirectly. Since the Reform Act of 1832, Parliament had always made it a necessary portion of the qualification appertaining to the franchise that the individual should be rated or have paid rates. In 1867 Parliament established a household qualification; but no sooner had that been done than legislation on the subject was speedily seen to be necessary to effect a reform regarding payment of rating, as it was seen that there was a certain class of occupiers who could not be rated. There was also in England a large class of occupiers who could not be rated. There was also a power in England given to overseers to make an arrangement with landlords and tenants, in order that the landlord should be considered the tenant and pay all the rates. This, by making an allowance of from 10 to 15 per cent upon the rates for the facilities afforded for their collection from a wealthy and solvent landlord, put a premium on disfranchisement. Under certain circumstances, under succeeding Acts, lodgers were deemed to be rated, and it was held that rating was not necessary. There was a large class of persons whom it was unjust, unfair, and unreasonable to disfranchise, because they were not liable to pay rates; when for others it was provided, because they paid rates in an indirect manner, that it should not be necessary for them to pay rates. There was also what was known as the "split house" difficulty—a difficulty which was that a claimant for the franchise did not occupy the whole house himself, but occupied a separate dwelling in the house, consisting of a few rooms. By a decision of the Court of Appeal about three years ago some of these persons had the franchise. There were also cases in which the landlord to whom the tenants paid their rents resided in part of the house, and in this case it was contended that the tenants were lodgers, and not householders. In cases of this sort, where tenants paid rents to the landlord for their rooms, it was held by Revising Barristers in England and the Superior Courts that the individuals were entitled to the franchise, notwithstanding the fact that the landlord had resided on the premises. The Bill proposed to amend the law in this and the other respects he had indicated, and he hoped that it would meet with the approval of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Mr. LEWIS (Londonderry), in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, it was another illustration of the bad habit of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway in not allowing the House to know of the provisions of the Bill until the last possible moment. The Bill appeared on the Order Book four months ago, and yet it was only delivered yesterday. No one reading the title of the Bill would have the slightest idea what it was. It was totally misleading, for it was no more a Registration Bill than the Home Rule Bill was a Registration Bill. It was really a new Reform Bill under the guise of a Registration Bill. He was perfectly astonished to hear the hon. Member speak of the Bill as removing the technical difficulties in the way of registration. The 7th clause, certainly, did deal with registration; but it was already in the Irish Registration Bill of last year. Thus, the only part of the Bill which dealt with registration was unnecessary, and all the rest was a Reform Bill. They were told that it was their duty to assimilate the law between England and Ireland; but this was no attempt to assimilate the law, but to make the law in Ireland dissimilar to that in England. What was this Bill, which really should be in the charge of the Government? There was a small narrowing of the period of occupation. He was not saying whether that was right or wrong. But whatever might be their opinion on that point, it was a vital, not a technical matter. Then there was the question that the non-payment of rates should not be a disqualification in voting, which was also one of the vital principles of the Bill. Why, it was conceded by all Parties that they must hold on to the payment of rates in connection with the duties of citizenship. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Dillon) said that it was a mean and scandalous system that the persons should be defrauded of their votes because they did not pay their rates, and he (Mr. Lewis) hoped the country would understand that proposition, for there was no justification for the representation that that condition defrauded men of their votes.

MR. DILLON: I beg your pardon; what I said was, that it was a public scandal to make use of that provision in order to defraud persons of their votes by postponing the date for the payment of rates for that purpose.

MR. LEWIS: Well, I did not profess to make an exact quotation from the hon. Member's speech. I did not hope to do so, and have left off quoting from the speeches of hon. Members below the Gangway, because I find they are always able to deny them.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether that observation is in Order? I repeated accurately what I had said.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry, I am sure, will accept the disclaimer of the hon. Gentleman Mr. Dillon.

MR. LEWIS: I have only repeated what was said in the hearing of the House. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] I decline to withdraw; but I accept the disclaimer of the hon. Member. As regards the Strabane Board of Guardians, I think the majority of the Guardians are Nationalists. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, whether that is so or not, the collectors should give the voter several weeks' notice, in order that he may be in time to pay his rates and get the franchise.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is the hon. Member aware that provision only lasted for one year?

MR. LEWIS continued to say that the Bill laid down the principle that, for the franchise, no more paying of rates was necessary. Under the Registration Act of 1878, rather by inference than intention, this state of things was arrived at—that a person occupying an unfurnished room at 1s. a week was to be declared a householder, provided the landlord did not reside on the premises. But this Bill proposed that every person who paid 1s. a week for an unfurnished room, and paid no rates, was entitled to the franchise, though, under the present law, he would be entitled only if he held unfurnished rooms at not less than £12 a-year. This perpetual nibbling at conditions which were considered necessary safeguards of the franchise was most injurious, and it would be better if hon. Gentlemen told the House at once that they proposed to confer universal suffrage. But with regard to the lodger franchise hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway acted very differently. In Ireland the lodger franchise was mostly a Conservative element, and in the borough which he represented there were 70 or 80 lodger voters, of whom nine or 10 belonged to the Nationalist Party, and the rest to the Conservative. That fact rankled in the breast of hon. Gentlemen. By the present law, if a lodger, whose right to vote had been admitted, wanted to claim in subsequent years, the fact that he held the same lodgings on the same conditions was prima facie proof of his right. But it was now proposed that, in his case, the mere service of a notice of objection, without stating the grounds upon which the objection rested, was enough to destroy that prima facie right. Hon. Gentlemen therefore proposed to abolish the law for the protection of the lodger voter. If this Bill met with the sanction of the Government, he thought he was entitled to say that they were utterly regardless of the provisions of their own measure. Those Gentlemen who wanted to do away with technical difficulties proposed actually to create them with regard to the lodger. Did the Government intend to give their imprimatur to a proposal which would virtually destroy the lodger franchise in Ireland, simply because it was a Conservative element? He hoped the House would not be so absurd as to give its sanction to a measure which was practically a new Reform Bill, introduced in the dying hours of this Parliament. If brought in at all, it ought to have been introduced on the responsibility of the Government, and should be applied to the whole country. The Bill had two principles, the one to destroy all the safeguards of the franchise which seemed to be impediments to the Liberals, and the other to create impediments for those who were not Liberals. He maintained that the Bill ought to be rejected, and he therefore moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

MR. CHAS. WARING: Down. N. said, that he did not intend to detain the House for any length of time. He only desired to second the Motion for postponing the second reading of the Bill to that day six months, which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member

He maintained that the Bill ought to be rejected, and he therefore moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Colonel WARING Down, N. said, that he did not intend to detain the House for any length of time. He only desired to second the Motion for postponing the second reading of the Bill to that day six months, which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). They had been told by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) that the Bill was a very simple one. He (Colonel Waring) quite concurred in that description; for, in his opinion, it was in reality a very simple Bill. It was a Bill which might be contained in a single clause, and it ought to be entitled "A Bill to establish Manhood Suffrage in Ireland." That object, which was the real object of the measure, might, however, have been attained in a manner much more simple than that employed in this Bill. The reduction of the period of residence might very well be left to be discussed on the Bill, which he understood on good authority, was in the contemplation of the Government to introduce, and which would not be open to the objection he took to this Bill, and to all similar Bills—namely, that it applied only to Ireland. If it were considered desirable, and for the good of the United Kingdom, that the period of residence to qualify for a vote should be reduced to six months, he saw no reasons why it should not be so reduced in Ireland. But if, on the other hand, it was not considered good to apply such a change to England and Scotland, he saw no reason to except Ireland from the operation of the existing Registration Act. They were told that the payment of rates was an unreasonable thing to exact. They were also told that there were classes in Ireland who were not rated at all, and in respect to whom rates should not be required to be paid before registration. But, as a matter of fact, these persons were rated in the names of the owners who were on the rate-book; and, although the landlords were called upon to pay the rates, there was no reason why these rates should not be required to be paid like any others. Notices were served upon all landlords that they should supply the necessary information. Therefore, there need not be any disfranchisement because the landlords had not paid the rates in due course, for it must not be forgotten that it was in the power of tenants to pay the rates, although this had been neglected by their landlords. They could pay, and then deduct the rates so paid from their rent. They were told that the so-called privileged classes in Ireland were not obliged to pay rates, but that rates on property must always be paid. The rate collector would always take good care to secure payment of those rates, if there was anything on the property from which immediate payment could be exacted. The 5th clause had been alluded to by the hon. Member in charge of the Bill. Practically, it would make every occupier of a room an occupier of a house, and would also reduce the qualification for lodgers from £10 a-year to 1s. a-week, or nothing at all, or possibly to 1d. But there was another clause which had not been referred to by the Mover or Seconder of the second reading, or by his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry. That was the 6th clause, which would have the effect of disfranchising large classes of persons who were registered in respect of property on which they did not reside. Suppose that he (Colonel Waring) were registered for an occupation franchise, and not having a property qualification besides, were to leave home, and let his house for four months, then, under the clause, he should lose his vote—"No, no!" He was bound to take the denial of hon. Members below the Gangway that that was their intention; but he thought most distinctly that it would be the effect of the Bill. As to the question of the alteration of the time when the Register was to come into force, that had been dealt with by the hon. Member for Londonderry. He (Colonel Waring) thought that it should be the shortest period possible, and he did not object to the shortening proposed by the Bill, provided that the law applied equally to all parts of the United Kingdom. He thought, however, that the subject should be dealt with by the Government, and should be done by an act of general application. When the last Reform Bill was under discussion, one great argument for the extension of the franchise in Ireland was that it was desirable to assimilate the franchise in all parts of the United Kingdom. But now they were going to do exactly the reverse by the Bill, which proposed to make different laws for Ireland, and for the rest of the United Kingdom. Entertaining as he did the strongest objection to such a course, he would second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Londonderry that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

Colonel Waring

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Chelsea) said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down (Colonel Waring) had not added much to the speech of the Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Lewis). He thought the hon. and gallant Member was mistaken as to the probable force of Clause 6; and he was of opinion that that clause, if applied to England, would not be likely to have a large operation. The hon. Member for Londonderry was undoubtedly one of the highest authorities in the House on questions of registration, and had done great service on Committees which had investigated the subject. He was, indeed, the last man who should demand more time for the consideration of a Registration Bill; because he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) thought that, while some hon. Members might have had reason to complain that they had not had time to consider the Bill, the hon. Member would be able, in five minutes, to understand any registration question that might be put before him. The hon. Gentleman considered Clause 7 unnecessary; but it seemed to him (Sir Charles W. Dilke) a valuable clause, inasmuch as the chief thing it did was to get rid of the last six lines of Clause 4 of the Act of 1878. The hon. Gentleman was severe on the Bill and those who proposed it, because he said it was desirable in general to assimilate the laws of England and Ireland. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was disposed to agree with the hon. Gentleman that it was desirable to assimilate as far as possible, and he should like to make the Bill apply to England and Scotland, as well as to Ireland. He would support the hon. Gentleman in his opposition to some of the clauses. For instance, he could not concur in the views of hon. Members below the Gangway in regard to Clause 8 dealing with the lodger franchise. The Lodger Clause, so far as England was concerned, was, no doubt, at first very favourable to the Liberal Party, though it had now become more favourable to Conservatives; but, whatever its Party effect, he did not think anyone would desire to throw restrictions in the way of lodger claims, and he should support the hon. Member in his opposition to Clause 8 of the Bill. No doubt there was a danger of manufacturing fraudulent lodger votes. There were cases where a large number of sons living with their father were put on the Register at nominal amounts as rent; and, if those rents were added up, the total would very much exceed the rent of the house in which they were living. But that was a reflection on the Revising Barristers, whose duty it was to prevent this being done, and who had power to very severely cross-examine a lodger when he first claimed the franchise. "No, no!"

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to correct him? By a slip in the Act of 1868 it has been held that a lodger, coming up for the first time, can claim his vote by a declaration.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not, of course, speak of the action of Revising Barristers in Ireland; but in England he had attended Revising Courts, and even since the decision to which the hon. Member had just referred he had found that the first claim of lodgers had been very strictly scrutinized. He believed the law as it stood was, if well carried out, sufficient to prevent lodgers getting on the Register improperly; and he thought that, on the whole, it was very well carried out. Clause 9 he considered to be nonsense, and he would be inclined, if anything, to go a great deal further, hoping some day to see a system of registration adopted throughout the Three Kingdoms which would be a self-acting system, and by which a fresh Register would be brought into force much more frequently than once a year. At the same time, he doubted whether it was a good clause in itself, although, to some extent, it tended in that direction. Having said so much on points in which he agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lewis), he now came to the clauses which he concurred in, and which enabled him warmly to support the second reading. Clause 3, which shortened the period of qualification by residence, was undoubtedly very important, and he was glad it had not been opposed on its merits by anyone. In London the working classes were in the habit, in a very great number of cases, of frequently leaving their residences; but that was caused very largely by following their work. He thought that there was a growing feeling in the country that the present period of residence, which was dealt with in Clause 3, should be shortened. The present requirement of one year's residence practically raised the qualification to an average of two years. Moreover, it crowded the Register with dummies—the names of persons who were dead or removed—and that greatly increased the chances of personation and the expenses of elections in finding out the addresses of persons who had removed. On a London Register, for instance, of 10,000 voters, it would be found that about 3,000 had now removed; and, in many cases, there was no possibility of tracing their addresses. Even with a residential qualification of six months, as proposed by the Bill, it would, on the average, be a year and a-half, under the present system of registration, before one could get on the Register. Taking the case of a man who came into a house on 21st January next, that man would not, even under the Bill, get on the Register until 1889, because he would be too late for the Register of 1888. If they were to take a yearly period of registration, in his opinion the actual being in the premises at a particular date before that began ought to be sufficient to qualify. Therefore, in his opinion, six months was even too long a period; but, in order to meet the approval of the House, he would suggest that a single term of three months should be sufficient. They would then get an average of a year and three months, instead of, as at present, an average of two years. As to the clause relating to the payment of rates—Clause 4—the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lewis) spoke of the payment of rates as a vital principle; but it would be found, as a matter of fact, that no one in the very poorest quarters of the great towns was disfranchised for the non-payment of rates, for the occupiers of tenements cases got the franchise independently of that—

MR. LEWIS: But the landlord pays the rates.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he admitted that; but the rate had no connection with their rent. The landlord got their rents out of them, whether he paid their rates or not. Therefore the people who were disfranchised were disfranchised by no fault of their own, but by the neglect of their landlord to pay their rates. The tenant simply paid so much a-year rent and took no account of rates. He agreed with the author of the Bill that the payment of rates had no real connection with the actual exercise of the franchise. The theory that the one was indispensable to the other was substantially destroyed years ago when the compound householder was created by the Rating Act of 1869, and there only remained a constructive connection. To his mind, it was a question whether they ought not to go much further in the direction of Clause 5, as he doubted very much whether there was any ground for maintaining the distinction the law now made between the lodger franchise and the household franchise; and if it was possible to get rid of that distinction they ought to do so, for it had proved to be enormously costly, both in the preparation of the Register and at elections, and both to the candidates and the authorities of the place, by the preparation of the two lists of lodgers and householders. The distinction caused many hardships, besides involving the keeping of two Registers, and he would be glad to get rid of it altogether. The clause in the Bill was a step in that direction, and was, therefore, entitled to support. The hon. Member for Londonderry would therefore see that he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was in agreement with him on two of the clauses; but, on the main clause, he was opposed to him. It was most desirable that the House should agree to the second reading, in order that in Committee they should consider whether they could not improve it; and it was a matter deserving of every consideration whether the provisions of the Bill should not apply to England. They would be fortified in that point of view by the acceptance of the Bill before the House.

MR. CROMPTON (Staffordshire, Leek), in supporting the Bill, said, he felt bound to congratulate the hon. Member (Mr. Dillon) upon having introduced a Bill which he (Mr. Crompton) looked upon as one of the most valuable yet brought forward, not only as regarded the provisions of the Bill itself, but as having elicited the speech which had just been made by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in favour of carrying some of the clauses not only for Ireland, but also for this country. He had been delighted to see the way in which the legislation they desired for Ireland was conducted by the Irish Members. He thought if they were to take their action in regard to this measure as a sample of what would happen during the whole of a Session, it must be regarded as promising well for the legislation they would see when the Irish people carried on their legislative functions in their own country, as, no doubt, they would before long. And there could be equally no doubt that they were in advance of English Members in all these social matters, which they seemed to have studied so carefully and well. With regard to the objections raised, the hon. Member (Mr. Lewis) asked whether the House wanted a Reform Bill every year, and argued that it was not wise to have a great Reform measure settled by a Parliament and then have a new one introduced every succeeding Session. But there was no point or force in the argument based on that consideration; and the only answer he (Mr. Crompton) had to give was that the Reform Bill of a year and a-half ago was one that had been carried through by the agreement between the two Front Benches, the rest of the House having practically nothing to do with it. It seemed to him that that measure could only be regarded as a mere instalment of the Reform which most hon. Members desired to see brought about in the course of a few years. The present Bill seemed to him to go far in the direction of establishing some of the important points to which he thought attention ought to be directed. It was, in the first place, a great step, for instance, in the direction of residential manhood suffrage. In the next place, it would get rid of the absurdity of the present system, under which a voter was not entitled to be put on the Register till the rates were paid; and, in the third place, it went very far towards doing away with the distinction at present made between lodgers and tenants. With regard to the question of payment of rates, he had always thought that when the compound householder point was settled, after the 1867 Reform Act, it really put an end to the system that had prevailed up to then, and since then they had got the service franchise, which was not dependent on the payment of rates at all; so that when it was seen that whether a man had a vote or not did not depend on whether he paid the rates, or someone else paid them for him, it would seem to be high time to put an end to a system such as that with which this measure proposed to deal. As to the question of the distinction made between lodgers and householders, he need add very little to what had been said by the right hon. Baronet who had just spoken. It was monstrous that a man should be considered to be a householder if he occupied a room in a house in which his landlord did not reside, and that he should be held to be simply a lodger if the landlord lived in some other part of the house. Moreover, he never could understand why there should be a limit of £10 in the lodger franchise. Practically speaking, the £10 limitation reduced the lodger franchise almost to a farce. The statistics as to the number of lodgers before the late Reform Bill showed that the number put upon the franchise was something over 20,000 lodgers for the whole of England and Wales; and of that number something like 15,000 were in London; so that throughout the rest of England and Wales there were not more than 6,000 or 7,000 lodgers on the Register. It certainly seemed a farce to give a franchise of that kind when it was found that so few persons were willing to take advantage of it. He approved of the clause in the Bill dealing with the lodger franchise, and that was one of the grounds on which he should give his vote for the measure. With regard to the 8th section of the Bill, he thought there might be some penalty introduced in case of objections that ought not to be made, and as to the 9th section he did not see much force in the objection that had been made to it. They knew that the Municipal Register commenced on the 1st of November, and the Parliamentary Register on the 1st of January, and he did not see that there was any reason why the Parliamentary Register should not commence at the earlier period. On the grounds he had stated he had great pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. KIMBER (Wandsworth), in opposing the Bill, said, they were told by hon. Members from Ireland that they desired to have laws which would place their country on an equal footing with England and the rest of the United Kingdom. He did not at all complain that the Bill should emanate from the Irish Benches—he thought that laws relating to Irish affairs might reasonably emanate from a Grand Committee of the Irish Members themselves. In providing for the representation of the people especial care should be taken that the laws should be based on equality. He quite agreed with the statement that the present law was household suffrage regulated by the payment of rates and rents. But what was the effect of the Bill? It would effect a radical alteration in the representation in Ireland, for it really proposed to establish “manhood suffrage,” and should more correctly be called a Manhood Suffrage Bill. It destroyed household suffrage, and evaded the principle of representation and taxation going together. Another objection to the Bill was that it would put the representation of Ireland on a different basis from that of England and Scotland. If it were accepted, English Members would be elected to Parliament upon an entirely different qualification to that of the Irish Members. He was disposed to agree that the period of residence might be shortened; but, if so, this should be extended to England. If the Bill were good for Ireland it would be equally good for the rest of the country; and, in his opinion, the subject ought to be dealt with by the Government in a general measure applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom. It was for Parliament to consider, first, whether the principle of the Bill was a right one to carry out for the whole of the United Kingdom.

Mr. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.), in supporting the Bill, said, he hoped it might be possible, when the House got into Committee, so to extend its machinery as to provide for a complete and efficient system of registration. He quite agreed with the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that it was unnecessary to maintain the distinction between lodgers and householders. The 8th clause of the Bill, as it stood, would have a disfranchising effect with regard to the occupants of furnished lodgings, and would give them a great deal of unnecessary trouble. A slight alteration of the clause relating to household franchise would make it applicable to lodgers also, and there would then be no necessity for special legislation for lodgers. He would suggest that the Register, when it had been settled, should be final. Anything in the nature of the investigation that took place in the case of the Stepney Election was a scandal to the Election Law of the country. He cordially agreed with the suggestion that the Bill should be made applicable to England, and he hoped that the Government would take the matter in hand and enlarge the scope of the measure. In his opinion the Revising Barristers could settle the voters' list in September; it could be printed in October, and come into operation in November.

Mr. SMALL (Down, S.) said, he thought that the Irish Party ought to feel complimented at the almost general desire of the House to have their Bill extended to England and Scotland. The clause relating to the lodger franchise had met with some opposition; but as one who had been engaged in the actual work of registration in Ireland, he could state that, under the present state of the law with regard to the admission of lodgers, many thousands were put on the Register who had no claim to the franchise. In the city of Londonderry the majority in favour of the sitting Member at the General Election was only 27, while there were no less than 75 to 80 Conservative lodgers on the Register. Therefore, if the law on the lodger franchise had been strictly administered in the way advocated by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), the hon. Gentleman who had moved the rejection of the Bill (Mr. Lewis) would not now be representing Londonderry; but the Representative of that City would be sitting among his (Mr. Small's) hon. Friends. As the law now stood, if a man made a declaration as a lodger it was taken as prima facie evidence, and he was not called upon to give evidence in the witness-box, even if his vote were objected to, until the objectors had given some evidence. The Bill, however, made it necessary for him to come forward and give positive evidence on oath before his vote was prima facie admitted. If the House would not accept the clause, some further safeguards were required against the admission of unqualified lodgers. Hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway who had opposed the Bill were without experience of the Irish Registration Courts, and he trusted that

Mr. Kimber

English and Scotch Members would be convinced by the statements of his hon. Friends.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.) said, that the discussion showed that the principles raised by the Bill commended themselves to the Representatives of other parts of the United Kingdom beyond Ireland. The objection to the Bill, on which the greatest force was laid, was that this measure could not be extended to the United Kingdom; but they might make their minds quite easy upon that score, because, if the Bill passed its second reading, whether it be competent to extend its provisions to the United Kingdom in Committee or not, they know enough now of the advantages of the principles embraced in the Bill to be certain that a very short time would be taken to make them law through the United Kingdom. As to the Residence Clause, he thought it would be found that there was really no reason why the limit of residence should be six months rather than three or two months. If they took the case of that class of voters who were obliged to change their residence, not from wantonness, but because of necessity, it was monstrous that they should be disfranchised. He was disposed to go even further than the Bill; and he thought that, ultimately, it would have to be this—that, for instance, if a man qualified as a voter in Division A should be obliged to change his residence to Division B, he should be able to carry with him a certificate which would entitle him to be put on the Register, as a matter of course, in Division B. He should be entitled to take his citizenship and his qualification with him, just as he took his personal character and personal effects. The second great principle of the Bill was to destroy the false connection between the franchise and the payment of rates. He knew it had been said that the intention of that connection was to deprive a man of his vote if unable to pay his rates. He, however, believed the real reason was that the payment of rates was to be a sort of evidence of good citizenship. If that ground were examined, however, he did not think it could stand, because it might with equal justice be said that a man should have paid his Dog Tax and his Income Tax before being put on the Register. With regard to the lodger, if they displaced his prima facie right when he claimed to be put on the Register, they compelled him to lose a day's work in order to establish it, and on that account he thought the clause in question ought not to be pressed. This measure was full of good principles, and he hoped the House would give it a second reading.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said, they spent their Wednesday afternoon in that House in a manner which had a most agreeable uniformity. They always had an Irish debate upon some measure or other, and the rule seemed to be this—they generally agreed, in the first place, that the principle of the Bill was good; in the second place, that the Bill needed some alteration in detail; in the third place, that it ought to be applied to England; and, in the fourth place, that it ought to be read a second time. He thought they were about to follow the usual Wednesday rule on that occasion, for there had been no variation, and there had been no opinion expressed that it would be contrary to propriety to extend the principle of the Bill to Great Britain. Indeed, one of the arguments against the Bill was that it did not apply to Great Britain, and the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. and gallant Member for North Down (Colonel Waring) both said they objected to any legislation which affected Ireland only. Well, he saw no objection to extending the principle of the Bill to Great Britain. There was, however, this to be said—that in the present position of the mind of the Government as to registration generally, his right hon. Friend sitting near him (Mr. Stanfeld) did intend, if circumstances permitted, to bring in a Registration Bill which should deal with the whole of the United Kingdom. Therefore, in all that he Mr. John Morley said on the present Bill, he must be understood to reserve his opinion as to the expediency of passing a Bill relating to Ireland alone, and rather to point to the wish of the Government to deal with the question as a whole, and to deal with it as promptly as circumstances would allow. Whether they would be permitted to deal with it rapidly enough to affect an Election that might take place next year, he did not know, and the introduction of such a Bill might be in the dim and distant future. The discussion had turned principally on Clauses 4 and 8. Some remarks of considerable importance had also been made on Clauses 2 and 3, which affected the question of residence for qualification. The hon. Member for Wandsworth (Mr. Kimber) denied the hardship of the present residential requirement; but he (Mr. John Morley) agreed with his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that considerable hardship might and did arise. It was incontrovertible that, under the present system, a man might go into occupation of premises on the 21st of January, 1887; he would not have completed his six months' occupation on the 20th July; and that being the case, he could not be on the Register for 1888, and, therefore, would have no power to exercise his vote until 1st January, 1889. The hon. Member for Wandsworth had objected to that statement; but, as he (Mr. John Morley) had said, it was perfectly incontrovertible. It was quite obvious that it might happen, and did happen, as they all knew, for there was not the six months' previous occupation that the law required. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that that was a very undesirable and indefensible state of the law. There had been a very general agreement that six months, irrespective of the date of commencement, as proposed in the 3rd clause, would be a very fair and reasonable period for giving a man a qualification. On the 8th clause, affecting the lodger vote, he shared entirely the view of his right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea. It seemed to him to be a very doubtful and retrograde step to cast on a lodger, when an objection was made to his name, the onus and obligation of establishing his claim, and to relieve the objector of all liability whatever from specifying the particular ground of his objection. What would then happen, he supposed, would be this—the agents of the two Parties would serve notices of objection wholesale to all lodger claimants, and that would throw upon them a very heavy burden indeed. As had been remarked by his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Shireass Will), the lodger who sought to establish his claim would have to do so by losing a day's work. He had not heard from any hon.

Mr. John Morley

Gentleman how far this lodger question affected Ireland—whether or not there was a great area over which it operated. In Great Britain, however, the lodger question was almost exclusively a London question. In his own constituency they had 31,000 voters on the Register, and he believed at the last General Election, there were only 78 of them lodger voters. He believed that the same statistics applied in the rest of the large Provincial towns in England. Although it might not be the case in Ireland, that was not a reason why they should assent to what could not but be regarded as a disfranchising clause. The proposition of the 4th clause was the proposition around which the most strenuous part of the debate had turned. That clause related to the payment of rates, and the question was whether the payment of rates should continue to be the condition of the exercise of the franchise on the present terms. Upon that point he was not prepared to anticipate the President of the Local Government Board, and say that the spirit of that clause would be incorporated in the measure that he would bring before the House. The hon. Member for Londonderry was certainly not so very far wrong when he described the Bill containing this clause as, in some degree, being not so much a Registration Bill as a Franchise Bill; but it was much less a Franchise Bill than might, from the mere statements and terms of the clause, appear to be the case. Under the existing law, a man occupying a house, to be entitled to exercise the franchise, must not only be rated to the poor, but must have paid all rates due from him before January 5th. But what was the value of those requirements? It was found, after the passing of the Act of 1867, that the rating requirements were absolutely unworkable, and Parliament had consequently to pass an amending Act. The result of the Registration Act of 1869 and of the Franchise Act of 1884 was, that it was enough, if someone were rated; and, whether anyone was rated or not, the occupier was to have the franchise. These provisions were framed with a view to cover householders; but they applied also to servants occupying their master's premises. If an occupier paid his rent, including the rates, in one sum, he ought not to be disqualified, as he was under the existing law, because his landlord had not done what he ought to have done. Not only that, but the farmer, who from neglect or from other motives, failed to pay the rates in time, might disfranchise all the labourers who occupied cottages on his farm. That was a very great grievance and injustice, and would amount to a fraud on the intention of the Act. With respect to the remaining clauses, there were many points that could be considered in Committee. The 5th clause seemed to put the occupiers of unfurnished rooms on the footing of tenants, instead of lodgers. Of course, a man, by becoming a tenant instead of a lodger, avoided the necessity of making an annual claim; he was not bound by the £10 valuation, and the period of qualification was shortened to six months. That clause, he must say, had very little to object to in it. The 6th clause touched a point not yet discussed as regarded England—that where there was household qualification, there would be a compulsory one to adopt. He thought that the hon. Member for Londonderry had, if he Mr. John Morley understood him rightly, made a point, when he referred to the case of a landlord, who was also an occupier, losing his franchise as an occupier. Was the landlord, in that case, to lose his right to exercise the franchise as an owner?

Mr. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin Harbour) said, that the Bill only applied in cases where the two qualifications were co-existent. The owner, in that case, would have to elect which qualification he would select.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY said, he could not understand how, in that case, by what automatic system it happened that if his qualification as occupier ceased, his qualification of owner gave him a right to vote. The 7th clause dealt with the point of registration, and was one that could be best considered in Committee. He regretted that the Bill, while professing to open up so large and important a subject, did not cover the whole ground in a direction in which those who were favourable to the measure were anxious to move. The point of successive occupation, for instance, was one of importance. It had been raised by the hon. Member Mr. Lewis, but the point was not put high enough. There were difficulties in the way of continuous registration, as regarded the way in which to carry it out, inasmuch as the list required time to print, and could only be issued once a year, and, consequently, great hardships were inflicted. It might, however, be considered whether they could not have supplemental lists issued, perhaps once a quarter, which should contain the names of all those who had died and those who had become entitled to be inserted on the Register. He should, also, not have been sorry to see the Municipal Franchise system combined with that of the Registration of Parliamentary Electors. He thought it would be found a convenience to have the same system of registration of electors for all purposes. The position of the Government towards the Bill was this—whilst, as he had shown, they emphatically dissented from more than one of the provisions of the Bill, whilst they thought that other provisions were of greater importance than could be dealt with on a Wednesday afternoon, and of too great importance to be dealt with in an isolated measure of this kind, yet they believed that it contained such useful and efficient proposals for remedying undeniable evils, that the Government would assent to, and support, the second reading of the Bill.

SIR JOHN GORST (Chatham) said, he had listened to the extraordinary announcement which had just been made with some surprise. He had, most emphatically, to complain of the manner in which the Bill before the House had been introduced. He wished to remind the House that that question of registration was one of the points which had been put before the country by the Prime Minister in his authorized Election programme—it was also one of those few subjects which, at the last General Election, was put before the country as a subject the Liberal Party, if returned to power, was really in earnest in desiring to see carried. Considering that circumstance, he thought it was somewhat remarkable, in dealing with the subject, that for the greater part of the afternoon the general supporters of Her Majesty's Government were conspicuous by their absence. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had sat alone on the Government Bench for the greater part of the time; and the right hon. Gentleman who was now by his side (Mr. Stansfeld), while present, did not join in the discussion. This, however, was not a Registration Bill; it was very much more like a new Franchise Bill which was being discussed before a thin House on a Wednesday afternoon. It was also extraordinary that the House should be asked to embark upon the consideration of a Bill of that character without the slightest assistance or guidance from the Government. If there were an independent Assembly in Dublin, he doubted greatly whether hon. Members below the Gangway would think of submitting to it so extremely vague and ill-considered a measure as that now before the House. Although the Bill had been introduced early in January, and although since then there had been ample time for the consideration and alteration of clauses, and for the Government to lay their proposals before the House, this Bill was only circulated amongst hon. Members the previous day. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said that the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) was perfectly capable of understanding a Registration Bill after five minutes' perusal. Well, there were many other hon. Members who could not do so, and he held that more time ought to be given before a decision was come to. It should have been circulated throughout the country, so that the constituencies and officers concerned in the registration should be able to examine and express an opinion upon it. He objected to the extraordinary manner in which the Bill had been introduced by a private Member, who proposed that it should be applied to Ireland, while the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had announced that he, and the Government also, apparently, were quite willing to extend the application of this Bill to England.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE explained that he had only spoken for himself.

SIR JOHN GORST said, that the case stood thus. A Bill for Ireland was brought in by a private Member. The Government then put up a confederate to say that the Bill might with advantage be extended to England.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he took exception to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman with regard to him. He had had no communication whatever with the Government on the subject.

Sir John Gorst

SIR JOHN GORST said, he would retract the suggestion that there had been any common action between the right hon. Baronet and the Government, or that he had been in any way their confederate. He hoped, however, he would be pardoned for saying that his close proximity to the Chief Secretary for Ireland in so small a House would necessarily attract attention, especially when it was seen by everyone—in fact, no one could help noticing it—that they had conversed together a great deal. He thought it was certainly premature that the House should be called upon to read a second time this unconsidered and ill-digested measure. Almost every clause of it might form the subject of debate by the House. As to form and construction, he regarded the Bill as one containing a number of abstract resolutions or propositions—some relating to the franchise, others to the subject of registration—which could not possibly assist the House, and might very greatly embarrass it in the future when it should come to the consideration of the measure dealing with registration which the President of the Local Government Board was shortly to lay before Parliament. He could not think that hon. Members below the Gangway intended it as a serious amendment of the Law of Registration in Ireland. Though the Chief Secretary for Ireland had objected to almost every clause of this ill-considered and ill-digested measure, it appeared that it was to form the basis on which the House was hereafter to be called upon to legislate, in accordance with the authorized programme brought forward at the last General Election.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, he must deny that he had said anything which would bear the interpretation of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

SIR JOHN GORST asked why it was, then, that the Government intended to support the second reading? He could understand them if they supported it merely as an affirmation of an abstract principle; but, after having asked the House to affirm that principle, he was astonished when the right hon. Gentleman told them that the Government were not going to adopt that abstract principle as the basis of their subsequent legislation. It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman was on the horns of a dilemma. If they wanted to alter the franchise, as this Bill did, the Government of the day was bound to bring in a new Reform Bill. The 1st clause of the measure proposed to alter the period of residence. Now, that undoubtedly was a portion of franchise. Were they going at that period of the Session, and at so critical a moment, to attempt to pass a new Franchise Bill? Surely the law as to the franchise could not rightly be changed at the suggestion of a private Member in a thin House on a Wednesday afternoon. They ought rather themselves have introduced such a measure if they desired to deal with the matter. The objections which could be raised against the 1st clause applied with equal force to the 2nd. The 5th clause contained an attempt to define the term householder. That subject was also one which could only properly find a place in a Franchise Bill. The Courts had placed one interpretation on the term, and the clause would put another upon it. He did not know that the definition in that Bill was more clear or more defensible than the definition given by the Judges; but the distinction between a householder and a lodger was no doubt a question well worthy of the attention of the House and of the Government; and if the Government would come forward with a well-considered proposition to provide a more satisfactory definition, he for one would be ready to receive it with the most perfect candour. The speeches they had heard as to the payment of rates were most amusing. The payment of rates appeared to be considered as a matter too trifling to be worth preserving. He remembered the day when rates and residence were believed to be the great safeguards to the exercise of the franchise. He was aware that a great number of these safeguards had been whittled away by the Act of 1869 and succeeding Acts. He believed, however, that the payment of rates was a most important safeguard which should not be lightly interfered with. Another proposal in the Bill was, that those persons who were both householders and owners should only be registered as occupiers. Now, when a man got upon the County Register as a 40s. freeholder, he remained there without further trouble to himself; and if an objector to his vote failed to make good his objection he was liable to costs. He was, therefore, in a better position as to permanence on the Register as an owner than as an occupier. Moreover, the rights of those men were reserved by the last Reform Act; and if that clause of the present Bill applied to England—he could not speak as to the case of Ireland—it might have a disfranchising effect. The House was now asked to read a second time a Bill containing, first, a number of abstract propositions on the franchise of great importance, and requiring great consideration; and, secondly, a number of abstract propositions on registration which were universally condemned; and that the right hon. Gentleman opposite recognized as a proper function for the House of Commons on Wednesday afternoon. The hon. Member for the Leek Division of Staffordshire (Mr. Crompton) and some other speakers that day had frankly avowed themselves to be advocates of Residential Manhood Suffrage. Were the Government prepared to ask the House to pass an abstract Resolution in favour of Residential Manhood Suffrage? If so, let them say so. It had been said by the hon. Member that the Representation of the People Act was the result of an agreement between the Front Benches on the two sides of the House. That was a mistake. The Redistribution of Seats Bill was the result of such an agreement; but the Franchise Bill was discussed by the House on its merits. In former Sessions he had himself advocated Uniformity of Franchise Law for England and Ireland, and he adhered to that course still. They were told that the Government were in favour of the principle of the present Bill, and that they were not averse to the extension of its principle to England. If so, he would like the President of the Local Government Board to tell the House whether the principles of registration as expounded in that Bill, and which they were asked to affirm that afternoon, would be found embodied in the Bill which the Government would themselves introduce? He had himself been disposed to move the adjournment of the debate; but he now thought it would be better that the House should hear from the right hon. Gentleman a responsible and serious statement of the intentions of the Government on that subject; and, after hearing such a statement, the House would then be able to determine what course it should take on the present occasion.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. STANSFELD) (Halifax) said, he thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken had raised unnecessary difficulty as to the second reading of a private Member's Bill. He had treated the Bill as a ballon d'essai, sent forth with the knowledge and connivance, if not at the request, of the Government, to ascertain the feeling and temper of the House with regard to proposals which he (Mr. Stansfeld) himself might hereafter bring forward. As to that suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, all he had to say was, that he had taken no part whatever in the initiation or in the progress of that discussion; but undoubtedly, if he had understood that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was going to propose, or suggest, that the provisions of that Bill should be extended to Great Britain, he should have made it a point, at whatever official inconvenience, of being present at the commencement of the debate. It was, undoubtedly, the fact that his appearance in the House at a late hour was an evidence that he had not deemed it his duty to be there at an earlier stage of the discussion, feeling that the Government were well represented by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Neither he nor his right hon. Friend was responsible for that Bill. They could not prevent the introduction of private Members' Bills; but, at the same time, when such Bills came before the House, they were entitled to fair consideration on their merits. Nor did he see the advisability, or the sense, or the policy, of applying too stiff and rigid a rule of refusing to consider even the second reading of a Bill to which they might give a general concurrence, without pledging themselves to every clause and detail in it. He was not in any way authorized, or prepared, to make any distinct announcement as to what might be the contents of the Government Bill, which he hoped shortly to be able to introduce. It would not be right that he should do so; nor would it be convenient that he should state his personal views on the various subjects comprised in the clauses of that Bill. But he might say he was sure that the opinion of the Government, the opinion of the Liberal Party, the opinion, too, he believed he might say, subject to correction, of the Conservative Party—indeed, the opinion of men of all Parties—was tending to this result—that after they had established household suffrage in the counties, as well as the boroughs of the whole United Kingdom, the days of unnecessary restrictions were over, and that the principles of their system of registration must be the removal of all petty hindrances, and the simplification and facilitation of the registration of all those persons throughout the Kingdom who were duly qualified to vote. It had been said that unless the Government were prepared to support a scheme of Residential Manhood Suffrage, they must vote against the Bill. But the Bill did not contain a scheme of that kind. What was proposed was a reduction in the period of qualification; and, while he could not pledge the Government, he would express his own individual opinion that they were almost all coming to the conclusion that it would be desirable to reduce the period, and to facilitate the registration of qualified persons. The gist of the Bill was contained in Clauses 3, 4, and 5. Their purpose was to shorten the period of residence and to do away with the necessity of the payment of rates. As he had said, he was not prepared to make, on that occasion, any distinct announcement as to the intentions of the Government, nor would it be right for him to make such an announcement, as he hoped himself to introduce shortly a Registration Bill dealing with the subjects to which the clauses which he had named referred. He might say, however, that the tendency of their minds was in the direction of simplification. The Bill before the House, if read a second time, would certainly require considerable emendation in Committee; for, at present, it was too scanty. But he saw no reason for voting against the measure, or discouraging the private Member who, in the exercise of his undoubted rights, had brought it forward. When the larger measure should have been introduced, advantage might accrue from the knowledge which hon. Members would have acquired of the contents of the present Bill. He could not say, at that moment, whether the Government Registration Bill would include Ireland. It was not always easy to include England, Scotland, and Ireland in the same measure, when dealing with a subject in which all three countries were interested. The difficulty was one of drafting. Recognizing the right of the promoters of the Bill to proceed with it, in order that it might have a fair chance of being discussed along with the larger Ministerial measure, he was prepared to vote for the second reading.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Kent, Isle of Thanet) said, that the Chief Secretary had said that the Government Bill would concern the United Kingdom. He (Colonel King-Harman) presumed, therefore, that the Government did not consider Ireland as included in the United Kingdom. With reference to the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), he (Colonel King-Harman) must contend that to extend to England a Bill which, as introduced, had reference to Ireland only, would be a new departure in Parliamentary tactics. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) said that Parties were generally united in thinking it desirable that registration should be simplified and facilitated, and on that ground the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman overlooked the fact that the measure had very little indeed to do with the registration of voters in Ireland. He held that there were good grounds for adjourning the debate. The measure was one of great importance; its gist was not indicated in the name it bore, and it had only been printed 24 hours ago, although it was introduced on the 22nd January last, and therefore could not be said to have been properly considered. Another reason for adjournment was that a measure of this kind ought, if brought in at all, to be introduced by the Government, and not by a private Member. Under the circumstances, he proposed to give an opportunity for its further consideration by moving the adjournment of the debate.

MAJOR SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
— (Colonel King-Harman.)

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he hoped the House would divide upon the Motion for the second reading. He denied that the Bill had been discussed in an exceptionally thin House. They were only at the beginning of June, and therefore it was not at all too late in the Session to proceed with the measure. It was part of the traditional Tory policy to hinder everything that was advantageous. When hon. Members opposite felt that they could not meet those whom they opposed by fair arguments, they sought to avoid a decision.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) said, he should support the Motion for adjournment of the debate, because it was absolutely impossible for the constituencies to know the nature of the Bill. Although the Bill was introduced on the 22nd of January, it was only delivered yesterday, so that it was utterly impossible for the country to know anything about it. The Bill proposed important changes, not only in registration, but in the franchise, and the very fact that the Chief Secretary had consented to the extension of the measure to England was an additional and distinct reason why the debate should be adjourned, in order that English country constituencies, as well as the Irish, might examine it and know exactly what it was they were called upon to decide.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) said, he must oppose the adjournment, although he would admit that the House had reason to complain of Bills being brought forward on Wednesdays which there had been little or no previous opportunity of considering. No person had a better right to complain of Bills not being printed in time than he had, and he therefore heartily agreed in what had been said as to the inconvenience of the practice of Bills only being delivered the day before they came on; but, as he thought little inconvenience was caused on this occasion, he hoped the House would not consent to the adjournment.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE (Plymouth) said, he hoped that the Motion for Adjournment would not be carried to a division, as there was plenty of time, it being only half-past 4 o'clock, to discuss the Bill that afternoon, so that the views of hon. Gentlemen on the question might be more clearly set forth.

MR. LEWIS (Londonderry) said, he thought the Motion for Adjournment should be pressed, as a matter of justice to those outside. The Bill had been so recently printed that the Irish constituencies had had no opportunity of knowing its provisions through the ordinary sources of the Press, and delay was much more necessary when it was proposed to extend those changes in the franchise to England. The Bill had been kept back under circumstances which clearly showed that it had been wilfully kept back.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.) asked if the hon. Member was in Order in stating that the Bill had been wilfully kept back?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member meant to attribute any improper motive, he would not be in Order; but I did not quite understand his meaning.

MR. LEWIS submitted that, upon the face of it, it bore marks of having been intentionally kept back. It had been on the Order Book since 22nd January last; it consisted of only three sides of paper; and it had not been produced until yesterday; and all that was the clearest evidence that it had been kept back intentionally. Moreover, they had not heard a word of explanation from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway as to how the delay occurred. If any one of them had stated that it was from inadvertence, the explanation would have been accepted immediately. In fact, he had to complain that the practice of keeping Bills back till the last moment had become established with regard to Irish measures. The consequence was, in the present case, that, although the whole framework of the franchise was altered, the constituencies, as he had said, knew nothing of the Bill. He maintained that the Bill had been kept back intentionally since the 22nd of January, in order that its provisions might not become known. That was only one example of a system which he was glad to hear the Chief Secretary join in objecting to.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) said, he cordially supported the Motion, and trusted that it would be pressed to a division, as a protest against the habit, which had become very common, and at the same time very inconvenient—an inconvenience to which Mr. Speaker had himself recently referred—of not issuing a Bill till the morning of the day of its second reading arrived.

Question put.

The House divided:—

The Tellers, being come to the Table, reported the numbers, Ayes 133, Noes 249.

Whereupon Major SAUNDERSON, one of the Tellers for the Noes, stated that a Member had remained in the Left Lobby without voting.

MR. SPEAKER directed the honourable Member to come to the Table, and Mr. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR, Member for Leicester, having come to the Table, was asked by Mr. SPEAKER if he had been within the folding doors and heard the Question put, and the honourable Member having replied that he had been in one of the rooms behind the Chair, and had not heard the Question put, Mr. SPEAKER stated that he was not entitled to vote, and declared the numbers, Ayes 133; Noes 249; Majority 116.—(Div. List, No. 115.)

MR. EDWARD CLARKE (Plymouth) said, he voted just now against the adjournment of the debate, not because he thought that was a Bill which ought to pass its second reading, but because he saw no reason why the rest of the afternoon should not be devoted to the discussion of the Bill, especially as, although it originally concerned Members from Ireland alone, it now, from the statements made by the Members of the Government, concerned very seriously the interests of other parts of the United Kingdom. They had had two very remarkable speeches that afternoon from the Treasury Bench. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland sketched, in outline, what the history was of Wednesday Afternoon Sittings, and he said that a Bill was brought forward and its principle accepted, but that all its details were rejected, apparently by both sides of the House, and in the result, apparently, the second reading was agreed to. He, however, omitted to tell the end of the history—namely, that after the second reading had been agreed to, nothing more was heard of the measure. That, apparently, was what was proposed with regard to this Bill. The whole criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant upon the Bill was this—that two of its clauses were enfranchising clauses, and were too large for a discussion on a Wednesday afternoon; and the other clauses were matters to which he took serious exception. The reason why he (Mr. Edward Clarke) should object to the second reading of this Bill was to be found in its 1st clause, which said that the Bill was to be confined to Ireland. He had never opposed any measure for rendering it easy for those who were entitled to a vote to come upon the Register, and he was one of the Members on the Conservative side of the House who joined Mr. Firth, the late Member for Chelsea, when he proposed that there should be a continuous occupation franchise between the different quarters of a borough, which was separated into divisions. He believed there were many on that side of the House who, if the Bill were proposed by a responsible Member of the Government, and applied to the whole of the sections of the United Kingdom, would have been perfectly willing to discuss and consider in detail the suggestions it contained. But it was never attempted to make a separate law for Ireland in a case where there was no reason for it. If 12 months' residence were required in England, there was no reason why six months should be sufficient in Ireland. It might be that six months' residence were sufficient in England, as in Ireland; but, if so, why had not some Representative of the Government the courage to get up and say that that was what they meant? It was said that to pass the second reading of the Bill would be merely to affirm the principle of the limitation and reduction of the length of residence required in order to obtain the vote. That was not so. The principle was not affirmed by the Bill. If it were the Chief Secretary for Ireland and his Colleagues would agree to the extension of the Bill to the whole of the United Kingdom. The only principle affirmed by the second reading of the Bill would be that they were to make a different law with regard to the franchise and registration for Ireland from that in existence in other parts of the country, and that being the only principle and meaning of the Bill, he should resist and vote against the second reading. He understood by—he would not say the supercilious, but the condescending way in which Ministers talked about Wednesday afternoon, that they regarded it as a sort of matinée, interesting only to the performers themselves, and about which no critic thought it incumbent upon him to express an opinion. From the point of view of the Government, the affirmation of the principle of this Bill might be useful for electioneering purposes; but the second reading of it would have no effect upon legislation. Was the House of Commons to affirm that principle? The Government could take no further step with the measure, without pledging themselves to apply it to the whole of the United Kingdom. There was no special pressure in the matter. If the Ministry should survive its present disorders, it might be allowed to bring in a general Bill; and if it should be brought in, let it be applied to Ireland just as to this country. The House wanted to hear some more vindication of the Bill than they had yet got from the Government; because it was not pretended that the Bill should become law, or that any step would be taken by the Government to carry it into law. Besides, no suggestion or avilable of a reason had been offered to the House why they should take Ireland and deal with it exclusively in this way. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had stated that Clauses 3 and 4 of the Bill were matters too large to be dealt with on a Wednesday afternoon. The capacity of the House might be lower on Wednesday than on nights devoted to Government debates; but, if the capacity of the House on Wednesdays was too low to affirm, resolutely and decisively, the principles of these clauses, why should it affirm them at all? What was to be gained by having a pretended affirmation of the Bill by the House, which, by-and-bye, might be accepted by the Government, but, if it served its purpose, which the Government might turn over as being a mere eccentricity of a Wednesday afternoon? The 6th clause, the Chief Secretary for Ireland said he could not accept, and the 7th clause occupied a page of the printed Bill; he thought the author had spun out the 7th clause in order to make the Bill look important. He believed the Revising Barristers had all the powers necessary for them, in order to carry out what was supposed to be the object of this 7th clause. Then they came to the 8th clause, and with regard to that, the right hon. Gentleman objected to it altogether. After the right hon. Gentleman had finished his criticism and analysis of the Bill, it came to this—Three clauses were too large for a Wednesday afternoon; and with regard to the other three effective clauses, the 7th was unnecessary, and the 6th and 8th clauses the right hon. Gentleman rejected altogether. The second reading of a Bill ought to mean, and used to mean, that the House accepted, as a basis of legislation, the principle of the Bill brought forward, and was prepared to go forward with that legislation. Now the Government was not prepared to go forward with this legislation. If he opposed the Bill, it was not because he disagreed with the principle, but because, on the face of it, it was a Bill which might establish a new divergence between the law of the Three Kingdoms, and he could not contemplate any occasion upon which he should be able to give his vote in favour of such legislation.

MR. HOLMES (Dublin University), who rose amid cries of "Divide!" said, he was entirely in accord with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth. It appeared to him that there was the strongest possible reason why the House should not affirm the Bill, until the views of Her Majesty's Government were declared upon the question whether or not they were prepared to extend its provisions to the remainder of the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Morley) was prepared to vote for the second reading; because, as he declared, he was in favour of anything which was likely to simplify and facilitate the registration of voters. He (Mr. Holmes) was not opposed to the simplification and facilitation of the registration of voters; but he was not prepared to vote for the second reading of a Bill, merely because it affirmed an abstract principle. He wanted to examine the provisions of the Bill, and satisfy himself that they were desirable and suitable for the purposes for which they were intended, before he could give his vote for the second reading. He admitted that if the franchise were given to a certain class of people, that class should be afforded every possible facility for the exercise of the franchise; but he contended that the clauses of the Bill now brought before the House were highly objectionable, except, indeed, one clause, and that one was unnecessary. But he had a still stronger objection to the Bill, which, though professedly a Registration Bill, introduced in one of its clauses quite a new principle—a fresh Reform Bill, which hon. Members ought not to be asked to consider without proper Notice, which had not been given here. If, however, there was any likelihood of the Government adopting the provisions of the Bill, and applying them to the United Kingdom, he should be ready to consider them; but, so far as he could learn, that course on the part of the Government was not likely to be adopted. At all events, the Government had failed to give the House any satisfactory information on the subject. He knew that course had attractions for the Government and their supporters; but he and his Friends did not believe in it. So far as he was concerned, he would never vote for any measure which had no chance of becoming law. He objected to the clause which reduced the time of occupation necessary to entitle an occupier of a house to the franchise from 12 to six months. He certainly was not prepared to assent to it without further consideration. He could not agree with what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite—that, as the law stood at present, two years' residence was required before a man could vote; nor did he agree with the hon. Gentleman who said that if this Bill passed, 18 months' residence would be required. There might be cases in which these statements would be correct. But, as the law stood at present, a man might be in possession of the franchise after 13 months, and, under this Bill, after seven months. Then there was the 4th clause, which relieved tenants from the discharge of one of the most reasonable obligations of citizenship—the payment of rates in order that they might have the privilege of the franchise; and he objected to this clause much more than he did to the preceding one, because it

throw unnecessary blame upon public officers, who in Ireland, at all events, as far as his experience went, conscientiously endeavoured to do their duty. Besides that, it seemed to him that it was only reasonable that a man should have discharged his duty to the community, which the payment of rates implied, before he should be entitled to vote. In conclusion, he must say he could not help taking notice of this extraordinary fact, that, when it was proposed to take the second reading of a Bill, introducing such an important principle as this, there should be only two right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. There were, in fact, many reasons to be assigned for rejecting the Motion for the second reading, and not one for affirming it, and therefore he was determined, for those he had given, to vote against the measure.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.), who spoke amid great interruption, said, he was much obliged to hon. Members below the Gangway for their genial courtesy to hon. Members sitting in his part of the House. As representing a town having four constituencies larger than those of any other town in Ireland, he thought he had a right to a few words with reference to this measure. He had only had an opportunity of seeing the clauses of the Bill that afternoon, and he thought a Bill which treated a grave question of this sort ought to be in the hands of hon. Members before the day set down for the second reading. Beyond that, it ought not to be in the hands of a private Member, but should be brought in by a responsible Minister of the Government. Hon. Members ought to be allowed time to examine the measure before they were asked to give a vote upon it, in order to see whether its provisions would contribute to the public advantage. In his opinion, such an opportunity had not been afforded in the case of this Bill. Now, he found that Clause 3 of the Bill proposed the reduction of the term of necessary occupancy to entitle the occupier to the franchise from 12 to six months, and that he considered very objectionable. He remembered a long discussion, which had taken place in the House on the question of the occupation franchise, and there was then a consensus of opinion in favour of the 12 months as being a desirable time to require as the minimum term for the occupation franchise. To reduce the term now to six months would be, in his opinion, to throw the preponderance in many boroughs into the hands of those who were, in a large measure, unfitted for the exercise of the privilege which would be conferred upon them. Then, notwithstanding the long-admitted principle that taxation and representation should go together, it was proposed to make it unnecessary for the tenant to pay rates. He contended that the payment of rates should form an essential qualification for the right to vote. Then, according to Clause 5, any number of occupiers could qualify for the same tenement; and, if such a provision as that was carried, the register would be multiplied fourfold, which was, he considered, a very serious matter at the present time, and was one to which the House should have an opportunity of giving serious and deliberate consideration. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had expressed his willingness that the principle of the measure should be extended to England, Scotland, and Wales; but what he Mr. De Cobain wished to impress upon the House—Loud and continued interruption. He would conclude by saying that he only wished to impress upon the House this fact, that the English, Scotch, and Welsh constituencies had a right to demand that the measure should be fully, maturely, and deliberately considered—a consideration which it was impossible to give to a Bill, the second reading of which it was sought to pass on a Wednesday evening before hon. Members had time even to examine its clauses with anything approaching care.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University), who rose amid cries of "Shame!" said, if hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway would allow him to say a few words, he would promise them that they should be very few. He did not wish to repeat arguments that were so well put a few minutes ago against the Bill, neither did he wish on that occasion to talk it out. Not that he should have, under the special circumstances of the case, any scruple in talking it out; he had been present at very many Wednesday discussions, and he had himself sometimes endeavoured to advance certain private measures occasionally with success, but very often without success. He had often taken part in the discussion of Bills of private Members, and he took it that it was a piece of exceptional good fortune on the part of a private Member if he succeeded in reaching the second reading on the occasion of his Bill being introduced to the House for the first time. Certainly the hon. Members in charge of this Bill could not complain if they did not succeed. His objection was one that recommended itself, he believed, to many hon. Members. He altogether objected to the principle of holding back to the last moment the preparation and presentation of Bills. Why was there such a course adopted as was followed in this case, in which the Bill was only presented at the very last moment? Why was it not printed earlier, in order that Members might have time to consider it? Either the Bill was useful, or it was not. If it was not, then the time of the House ought not to be occupied with it; but if it was useful, Members ought to have been furnished with it in time to allow them to consider it on its merits. He would urge upon Ministers the desirability of their more clearly stating their views. As he had said, he did not desire to talk the Bill out, but to press home a request upon the President of the Local Government Board, and that was the desirability of further information being given by the Government, to that which had been so far vouchsafed to the House, for it was most inconvenient that it should not be told distinctly whether the Government intended to extend the principle of the Bill to England and Scotland. If the right hon. Gentleman would do that, he would not say another word to interfere with the second reading of the Bill. He (Mr. Plunket) contended that the House was entitled to further information. It was unfair to have an attempt made to introduce another Franchise Bill, or a small kind of Reform Bill, on the back of what was called a Registration Bill. The Government had given a kind of shambling, half-hearted support to the Bill; but he wished to learn whether the Government were prepared to adopt the plan for England, or only for Ireland? For the past 16 years they had heard about the necessity of equalizing the laws for England and Ireland; but now the Chief Secretary was quite prepared and willing, when it suited the views of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, to vary that sentiment and policy, and give a kind of support to a Bill which materially altered the law between the two countries, by accepting that principle for Ireland but not for England. If it was a good thing, it should be adopted for countries; but, at all events, they were entitled to have a fair answer from the President of the Local Government Board. Were they prepared to adopt the principle of the Bill for England, or were they not? He did not wish to pass any opinion hostile to the Bill; but he did object that they should be called on at 24 hours' notice to adopt a Bill of two paragraphs and a very few clauses, which really contained two small Reform Bills, and a variation of an existing Registration Bill. But what he wished to make clear was, that, before voting on the question, the House had a right to ask that it should be made clear what were the intentions of the Government with regard to the application of the principles of the Bill; and he, therefore, asked the President of the Local Government Board to make the matter clear to the House at once?

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid.), who rose amid loud cries of "Divide!" said, he most strongly objected to the Bill, which was a fair sample of the kind of thing that might be expected from an Irish Legislative Body. He looked upon it as an attempt to introduce a new Franchise Bill under the guise of a Registration Bill. If a Franchise Bill was about to be introduced, he was exceedingly desirous that the legislation for the Three Kingdoms should be uniform; and he was perfectly prepared to support a Bill brought in by a responsible Government which would extend to the Three Kingdoms. Moreover, as Parliament was on the eve of important changes, these matters should be allowed to remain as they were for the present. [Cries of "Speak up!"] He had not the loud voice possessed by the hon. Member below the Gangway, and, therefore, he would not further attempt to address the House, but would move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HASLETT (Belfast, W.) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir James Currey.)

The House divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 201: Majority 103. — (Div. List, No. 116.)

It being after a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

STEAM ENGINES AND BOILERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. William Crawford, Bill to provide for the examination of persons having charge of Steam Engines and Boilers on land, ordered to be brought in by Mr. William Crawford, Mr. Burt, Mr. John Wilson (Durham), Mr. William Abraham (Glamorgan), Mr. Pickard, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 253.]

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brinton, Bill to provide for the Registration of Deeds of Arrangement, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brinton and Mr. Colman.

SANITARY REGISTRATION OF BUILDINGS BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Farquharson, Bill for the better sanitation of dwelling-houses, schools, hotels, hospitals, and other buildings within the United Kingdom, ordered to be brought in by Dr. Farquharson, Sir Henry Roscoe, Sir Gayer Hunter, and Dr. Cameron.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 255.]

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 3rd June, 1886.

MINUTES.] — WAYS AND MEANS — considered in Committee — Resolution [June 1] reported.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 7) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Borlase, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Borough of Bradford (Yorks.); the City of Chichester; the Local Government Districts of Cleator Moor and Hornsey; the Districts of Maryport, Southborough, and Tunbridge Wells; and the West Kent Main Sewerage District, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Borlase and Mr. Stansfeld.

ARMY (GUNS).

Address for "Return of all muzzle-loading Rifle Guns of 10-inch calibre and upwards, and of all breech-loading Rifle Guns of 6-inch calibre and upwards, constructed for the Service, giving the total number of rounds fired in each case, whether for experimental purposes or otherwise, and the number and nature of such guns which have required repairing, or have been condemned after firing." — Captain Price.

QUESTIONS.

MINES REGULATION ACT—HOURS OF WORK OF WOMEN.

Mr. J. WILSON (Durham, Houghton-le-Spring) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that on some of the "pit banks" near Whitehaven the women are working twelve hours per day; whether such working is a violation of the Mines Regulation Act (Part I, Sections 6 and 12); and, if so, whether he will order a prosecution in such cases?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BROADHURST) (Birmingham, Burdett) who replied) said: The Secretary of State has been in communication with the Inspector on this subject, and is informed by him that he has already called the attention of the agent of the colliery to which the hon. Member seems to refer to the matter, as, in his opinion, it probably constitutes a violation of the Act of 1872. The Secretary of State is glad to learn from the Inspector that the evil complained of is now remedied, and that accordingly a prosecution is not necessary.

COLONIAL STATISTICAL TABLES.

MR. OCTAVIUS MORGAN (Battersea) asked the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to Colonial Statistical Tables, Part XVII., Whether these Tables, which were presented to Members of this House on 28th May and relate to the years 1879, 1880, and 1881, can in future be produced at an earlier date; and, whether it is possible during the present Session of Parliament to publish similar Tables up to the end of the year 1885?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. O. T. D. ACLAND) (Cornwall, Launceston) (who replied) said: The Eighteenth Part of the Statistical Tables for the Colonies was unavoidably delayed in publication; but every endeavour will be made to expedite the issue of these Tables in future. It will, however, not be possible to publish them for the year 1885 during the present Session of Parliament, as the necessary Returns will not be received from the Colonies in time.

ARMY—DISCHARGED SOLDIERS—CASE OF MICHAEL NOONE, 1st BATTALION, ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Michael Noone, who enlisted in the 1st Battalion, Royal Irish Rifles, while training in the Royal Gymnasium School, received a hurt, which necessitated his removal to hospital in Dover, where he remained for four and a half months; whether he was discharged in consequence of being medically unfit for further service; whether it is a fact that he received no recompense whatever on his discharge, and was obliged, on account of the hurt received while training, to enter the Roscommon County Infirmary, where it was found necessary to amputate his right foot, as shown by Dr. Blakeney's certificate; and, whether, under all the circumstances, his case will be reconsidered, with a view to giving him a gratuity to enable him to learn a trade, and thus prevent his becoming an inmate of the Roscommon

Workhouse, and a charge on the rate-payers during the remainder of his life?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): The man appears to have had a weak ankle; for it turned under him once on parade and again in the gymnasium. After the latter mishap he was found to be suffering from chronic scrofulous disease of the ankle joint, and was discharged on the certificate of a Medical Board that he was unfit for further service. He had only served for 230 days, and was not entitled to pension or gratuity on discharge. I have no funds at my disposal from which to make allowance in this case, in which it is unlikely that the injury would have been permanent if the man's ankle had not already been diseased.

ADMIRALTY—THE ROYAL NAVAL VOLUNTEERS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is a fact that the uniform of the London Brigade of the Royal Naval Volunteers is different from that of the Brigades at Liverpool, Bristol, and the Clyde; and, whether it is intended to alter the Volunteer uniform, in accordance with the desire of the Volunteers, so as to assimilate it more closely to that of the Royal Navy; and, if so, whether early intimation of such change could be made so as to save expense to new recruits?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. HIBBERT) (Oldham): The Regulations as to uniform are clearly laid down in the Royal Naval Artillery Regulations, to which all brigades are expected to conform. It is not known that any deviations from these Regulations have taken place; but inquiries are being made on the subject. I am not aware that any wish has been officially expressed by the Volunteers that the uniform should be altered. If such an application were received I can assure my hon. Friend that it would meet with due consideration.

NAVY—COALING STATIONS IN THE WEST INDIES.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended to establish a coaling station for Her Majesty's Navy in the West Indies at the port of Castries in the Island of St. Lucia?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. HIBBERT) (Oldham): In reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I have to say that there is no intention of establishing a naval coal depôt at St. Lucia. A local contract is in force there for the supply of coal to Her Majesty's ships.

OFFICE OF WORKS—THE CONSULTING SURVEYOR.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the honourable Member for North West Staffordshire, If it is the case that the Consulting Surveyor of Her Majesty's Office of Works has resigned his appointment; and, if so, whether it is now intended to appoint some practical architect and engineer who will devote his whole time to the duties of the office, and not a gentleman engaged in private practice, who would be able to devote only a very limited time to the Service?

MR. LEVESON GOWER (A Lord of the Treasury) (Stafford, N.W.): It is true that Sir Henry Hunt has been compelled by ill-health to resign the appointment of Consulting Surveyor to the Office of Works, the duties of which he has for so long performed with conspicuous ability. The First Commissioner is in communication with the Treasury as to the appointment of his successor, and it is premature to make any announcement on the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CHIEF MONTSION.

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it has been decided to remove the Chief Montsion and his tribe to a Location; whether the Land Commission is allotting lands, hitherto owned and cultivated by this Tribe of Barolong, as farms to Europeans; whether a strong appeal from the Chief Montsion against such action has reached the Colonial Office; whether such action is in accordance with the Treaty made with Montsion in May 1884, the Order in Council of January 27th 1885, proclaiming British jurisdiction, or the Despatch of the Secretary of State of 13th August 1885, giving the terms of final annexation; and, whether a European township, in which spirituous liquors are sold, has been established immediately adjoining Mafeking, contrary to the wishes of the Native rulers, who have long and successfully resisted the introduction of alcoholic liquors into their country?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) (Denbighshire, E.): The Land Commission of Bechuanaland has not yet come to any decision as to the settlement of the land question in Montsion's or any other part of the Barolong territory. I am informed that so far as they have gone at present the awards of the Land Commission have given general satisfaction, both to the Natives and to the White people. A translation of a letter from Montsion has been forwarded by the Rev. John Mackenzie, to Earl Granville; but that letter contains a protest not against any action actually taken, but against the action which he is informed by White people is about to be taken against him, obviously a very different thing. Under these circumstances, the fourth Question does not seem to arise; but even if it did, I do not see what precise bearing the documents cited by the hon. Member would have upon it. I am informed by Sir Hercules Robinson that extensive buildings had been commenced at Mafeking by Europeans, who had previously obtained the permission of Montsion to build there; but, that Chief having requested that they might be removed, a new township has been laid out about two miles from Mafeking up the Molopo River, to which these Europeans are now moving. With regard to the sale of spirituous liquors at Mafeking, I have no express information; but the township will, of course, be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of British Bechuanaland which, while permitting the sale of spirituous liquors by licensed persons under certain conditions, prohibit, under severe penalties, the sale of "any wine or spirituous or partly spirituous liquors in any quantity whatever" to any Native. We have received no precise information on the subject of any interference by the Commission with Montsion's territory; but, as the hon. Member is aware, the Commissioners are expressly enjoined to have regard to the rights of the Native Chiefs and their tribes.

ADMIRALTY—THE NAVAL RESERVES —CHIEF GUNNERS AND GUNNERS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there would be any objection to placing chief gunners and gunners appointed to the Reserve for duties in the dockyards, on the same footing as regards length of appointments as the boatswains and master riggers of yards by the recent Admiralty Order of 2nd February 1886?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. HIBBERT) (Oldham): In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that it is not considered desirable to alter the present limitation of three years for chief gunners and gunners appointed to the Reserve ships for duties in the Dockyards.

WAR OFFICE CHARGES AGAINST "THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to an article in The Admiralty and Horse Guards Gazette, of Saturday, May 29th, headed "The Ordnance Department;" and, if so, what steps he proposes to take in reference to the grave, personal, and other charges therein made?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN) (Stirling, &c.): Sir, the hon. Gentleman's Question has been the means of calling my attention to the article to which he refers. Having read the article I do not propose to take any steps in reference to it. It contains wild and vague charges of gross corruption against officers in the Public Service, the exaggerated and preposterous nature of which charges conveys their own refutation.

PATENT LAW—ENSILAGE APPLIANCES.

MR. BEACH (Hants, Andover) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that a patent has been granted to one particular firm for supplying ensilage appliances, and that, under the terms of this patent, no other firm is allowed to sell wire-rope or flexible cord of any kind for the purpose?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. C. T. D. AGLAND) (Cornwall, Launceston; who replied) said: I am not sure as to what is the patent to which the hon. Member refers. A patent was granted in 1885 for the use in the compression of crops for ensilage of a wire rope or ropes, or equivalent strong or flexible bands, and the terms of the patent in question were in accordance with the provisions of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883. But it is impossible for the Board of Trade to answer Questions in the House as to the validity of this or any other claims of patentees.

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE—CONSULS AND DIPLOMATIC AGENTS ABROAD.

MR. HUTTON (Manchester, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, The names and nationalities of Her Majesty's Consuls, Vice Consuls, or Diplomatic Agents at Berlin, Breslau, Dresden, Dusseldorf, Frankfort, and Wismar; also the date and the period of the last Report on the Commerce and Industries of each of these districts, received by her Majesty's Government, and presented to Parliament?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. BRYCE) (Aberdeen, S.): I conclude that the hon. Member's Question only refers to the Consular Service, for Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service is, of course, composed of none but British subjects. The hon. Member will find the names of the occupants of the posts to which he refers in the "Foreign Office List;" but I may mention that the unpaid Consuls General at Berlin and Leipsic are German, while those at Vienna and Frankfort are British subjects. The British Consul at Dusseldorf is a British subject; but the unpaid Vice Consul at Breslau, Frankfort, and Wismar are Germans. I can only add, as I have already informed the hon. Member in this House, that whenever qualified British subjects can be found willing to undertake the duties of unpaid Vice Consuls, they are selected by preference; but to replace the unpaid Consular officers of foreign nationality by paid British subjects would involve an enormous increase to the expenditure on the Consular Service. To specify the dates and periods of the various Reports received from these officers would carry me beyond the limits of a Question; but I will gladly supply the hon. Member privately with all the information he may require.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — CATHOLIC JUSTICES, CO. DONEGAL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that there is not in the petty sessions district of Raphoe, or anywhere in the county of Donegal, within twenty-one miles of Castlefin, a Catholic justice of the peace; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to leave so large a district without a single Catholic magistrate?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I am aware that this matter is at present under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, and I will communicate with him in reference to it.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) — "BOYCOTTING" THE REV. JOHN FLEMING.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Rev. John Fleming, Incumbent of Ventry, county Kerry, has been lately boycotted at the instance of the National League, chiefly for having interposed to protect two parishioners who had come under its ban; whether he was at once unable to procure the ordinary necessities of life, and had to procure his supplies from a distance of sixty miles; whether, a little later on, his wife fell seriously ill of an illness which ended in her death, and whether, when at her worst, the local band turned out, accompanied by a large crowd shouting, and deliberately played within fifty yards of her bedroom window; and, whether Mr. Fleming was compelled to send forty miles for a coffin and hearse, as he dared not even ask for one to be supplied in the locality, and was then obliged to remove her remains into another county for burial?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The Rev. Mr. Fleming was, I understand, partially "Boycotted" for the cause mentioned in the Question for some time down to the middle of April last, when he became more obnoxious, in consequence of an eviction which he carried out, and he has since experienced difficulty in procuring supplies, except from a distance. A short time after the eviction, a number of people assembled and built a house for the evicted person, and on this occasion the band attended and played near Mr. Fleming's house. Mrs. Fleming was ill at the time, and died two days afterwards. Her coffin was procured from Killarney, and she was buried in Waterford, not, however, through compulsion, but from choice.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) — "BOYCOTTING," CO. SLIGO.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, at a meeting of the Templeboy Branch of the National League, held on the 18th April, the Rev. Mr. Cosgrave presiding, the following Resolution was passed:—

"That we hereby disapprove of the action of certain traders in this parish who, though they live upon the custom of the 'majority' of the people, yet took part in an Orange and Sectarian meeting recently held in Sligo for the purpose of opposing and crying down any attempt of the Government to restore to our Country her legitimate rights to independent legislation, of which it had been unjustly and corruptly deprived; that we consider it the bounden duty of the people to mark their sense of such conduct by leaving those traders to live upon those who share with them in such 'loyal and patriotic' opinions;"

whether the meeting referred to was a meeting convened by the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union for the purpose of maintaining the legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland, and, if for the offence of attending said meeting, four Protestant shopkeepers in county Sligo have been boycotted and their business ruined; and, whether the Government intend to institute any proceedings against the authors of the Resolution?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I am informed that the resolution referred to was passed as stated, and that the meeting to which it alluded was a meeting convened by the Loyal and Patriotic Union. Two shopkeepers have been "Boycotted" for attending the meeting; and I am also informed that two other shopkeepers, who did not attend the meeting, and who are themselves members of the League, have also been "Boycotted," though for what cause is not shown. Action of this kind is much to be deprecated; but I am advised that no legal offence is disclosed in the resolution. The police are, of course, on the watch to detect any overt act of intimidation.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BOARDS OF GUARDIANS—ELECTION AT MANORHAMILTON.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the presentation of successive Memorials from Glensfarnoe, county Leitrim, to the Guardians of Manorhamilton Union, praying for redress in the matter of alleged forged nomination papers for Cloonclare division of the said Union at a recent contested election; whether on the occasion of the presentation of a Memorial on the 13th May, 1886, it was met by opposition on the part of a Mr. Corcadden, P.L.G. and J.P.; whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been called to the language used by Mr. Corcadden at the time; and, whether steps will be taken to secure due considerations for Petitions presented to Boards of Guardians?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY) (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Some question has been raised regarding the nomination papers of two candidates who, according to the Return of the election, withdrew from their candidature; but nothing has arisen affecting the validity of the Return to render an inquiry by the Local Government Board necessary, and the Guardians have been so informed. The Lord Chancellor informs me that he has heard nothing of the language alleged to have been used by Mr. Corcadden, who would be quite within his right in opposing the reception of a Memorial. The consideration to be given by Boards of Guardians to communications addressed to them is rather a matter for the Boards themselves.

LAW AND POLICE—ARREST OF SIR THOMAS FERMOR-HESKETH.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received any report or information in relation to the arrest of Sir Thomas Fermor-Hesketh, when about to sail for America on board the S.S. Britannic at Liverpool on the 20th of May; whether he is aware that a bill of indictment had been preferred against Sir Thomas Hesketh, to establish his liability, ratione tenuræ, to repair a certain bridge in Northamptonshire; that Sir Thomas Hesketh's solicitor, on the 17th of May, informed the Clerk of the Peace that Sir Thomas admitted his liability, and would cause the bridge to be repaired; that thereafter the Chief Constable of Northamptonshire, without having applied for any warrant, and without any notice to or communication with Sir Thomas Hesketh, instructed the Liverpool police to arrest Sir Thomas, who was so arrested when on board the Britannic, on the point of starting for America, and removed in custody from the vessel; and, whether he will cause a full inquiry to be made into the conduct of all concerned in such proceedings?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT) (Derby) (who replied) said, the facts were as stated in the Question. The Chief Constable stated that a bill of indictment was preferred against Sir Thomas Hesketh on the 7th of May at the Northampton Sessions. The usual notice was given to the police, and on the 10th of May the Chief Constable wrote to Sir Thomas's solicitor asking him to arrange for the defendant to enter into the usual recognizances to appear at the next Sessions. The solicitor did not answer the letter, and on the 20th of May the Chief Constable, having received no reply to his letter, learnt that the defendant had taken passage for America without executing the recognizances which the law required. He therefore telegraphed to the Liverpool police to detain Sir Thomas; but upon the latter giving his word of honour that he would appear at the next Sessions, he was allowed to proceed on his voyage.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The right hon. Gentleman has not stated at whose instance the arrest was made, and whether he justifies it?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have nothing to say to that. I have stated at whose instance the arrest was made. The Chief Constable's duty was to see that the recognizances were entered into; and I am instructed that the Secretary of State sees no reason to interfere in the matter, in which if Sir Thomas Hesketh feels aggrieved he has his remedy against the Chief Constable.

Mr. John Morley

POST OFFICE—TRANSMISSION OF NEWSPAPERS TO INDIA AND AUSTRALIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will now state the number of newspapers and other publications sent from England to India and Australia, which, through various causes, were posted and not forwarded last year; if he cannot give this information, will he state the number posted in this Country, but not forwarded, last week, or any week this year; and, what is done with the newspapers and other publications which, through non-compliance with rules, are not forwarded to their destination?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The number for last year cannot be stated; but I have ascertained that during last week 171 were stopped, mainly because the senders had failed to prepay them properly. I may inform the hon. Member that all stopped newspapers which bear the sender's address are at once returned to them.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTI- LATION OF THE HOUSE—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth) asked the honourable Member for North West Staffordshire, Whether the works suggested in the first paragraph on page 7 of the Report of the Select Committee on the Ventilation of the House, for the purpose of condensing the steam and cooling the water from the boilers now allowed to pass into the main sewer under the Houses of Parliament, at a high rate of temperature, will be carried into effect during the Whitsuntide recess, as urgently recommended by the Committee?

MR. LEVESON GOWER (A Lord of the Treasury, Stafford, N.W.), in reply, said, that orders had been given for the carrying out of the works referred to during the Whitsuntide Recess; and it was hoped, if the Recess should not prove shorter than usual, that they would be finished before the House reassembled.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) asked the Member for North West Staffordshire, What steps it is proposed to take with reference to the Reports of the

Select Committee on the Ventilation of the House, in which it is stated that—

“The health of the Members of Parliament and of the officers who reside within the precincts of the Palace at Westminster is seriously imperilled by the defective drainage and sanitary arrangements which now exist in the building.”

and particularly whether it is proposed that—in accordance with the recommendation of that Committee; and, whether it is intended to give immediate instructions for the designing of such works, in order that they may be completed without unnecessary delay?

MR. LEVESON GOWER: The First Commissioner will give immediate attention to the important matters dealt with in the Reports of the Select Committee; but, the evidence not having yet been furnished to the Board of Works, it is impossible to give a final decision as to what steps ought to be taken. The House may rely upon it that no delay will take place in the consideration of the whole subject, and that no recommendation of the Committee will be overlooked. I shall hope to make a further communication to the House on the earliest possible opportunity.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) —ASSISTANT REVISING BARRISTERS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is proposed to make any special provision this year for the appointment of assistant revising barristers in Ireland; whether he is aware that, in several of the constituencies, where political parties are closely balanced, the revision of the lists of Parliamentary voters last year (divided amongst several barristers) occupied over ninety days' judicial work; whether the authorities in Ireland have had it brought to their notice that this state of things (for which the Registration Act of 1845 only made provision for one year) is likely to continue; and, what the Government propose to do as regards the coming revision?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Newcastle-on-Tyne), in reply, said, that he believed that Revising Barristers would require, in some cases, additional assistance. What that assistance would be was under consideration.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON EDUCATION—PHYSICAL TRAINING IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. BUXTON (Essex, Walthamstow) asked the Right honourable gentleman the Member for the Newton Division of Lancashire, Whether the Royal Commission on Education will include within the scope of its inquiry the means for the physical training and recreation of children in elementary schools?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): Yes, Sir; certainly.
